Saving Time, Money Mostly Matter Of Inborn Trait but Can Be Acquired

By Maxine Buren

I guess economy of time and money is an inborn trait and one which it's a bit hard to acquire, but it seems to me that one can cut down a good deal on the budget and still live pretty well, if care is taken with the little things.

For instance, we're always fussing about vitamins, yet some cooks still load their vegetables with water and then pour it off. Down the drain goes a lot of flavor and much of the nutritive value of the food.

The other day we read about a recipe in which the writer proudly suggested that drop biscuits were a time saver. Personally we like drop biscuits, the crusty points that brown and form bits of crunchiness attract us. For this very important reason and because we like to save every minute possible, we haven't rolled out a biscuit for years. They have more personality than plain old perfectly formed ones.

Economy in food comes with tongue out the weekend, when no one knows how many will suddenly show up at dinnertime on Sunday. Here's a recipe for the use of this meat:

BEEF TONGUE PIQUANT
1 fresh beef tongue
Water to cover
2 teaspoons salt
1/4 cup enriched flour
2 tablespoons lard or drippings
12 ounce glass tart grape jelly
1 cup hot water

Cover tongue with water and add salt. Cover closely and simmer, allowing about one hour per pound. Cool in cooking liquid. Remove from liquid, peel skin from tongue. Dust with seasoned flour and brown in lard or drippings. Combine grape jelly and hot water. Mix thoroughly. Pour mixture over tongue. Cover closely and simmer 40 minutes. 8 to 10 servings.

There are dozens of economical foods that we sometimes forget because they are so familiar. All
