> There are other reasons why the British do not expect to have to fight. The businessmen especially rather nervously hope that the communists have already decided to allow Hong Kong to continue to function as a funnel for trade and a "windone to the west." The evidence which supports this view is certainly not conclusive, but it is strikingly interesting.

> A kind of barter trade, rather like the China trade of the clipper ship days, has been quietly carried on between Hong Kong and the communist north ever since the initial communist victories As in the old days, it has sometimes been highly profitable, with a single voyage netting a neat hundred per cent return. And very recently the communists have evinced a more formal interest in trade with Hong Kong.

They first approached a great Chinese bank, with close nationalist connections, to act as their Hong Kong trading agent. The Chinese bank, whose main branches were still under nationalist control, refused as politely as possible. The communists then turned to a Belgian bank, with correspondents throughout the world.
