Time to Study Habits of Moths and Help Decrease Insect Population

By Maxine Buren
Salem Woman's Editor

It's getting along very close to moth time. Lucy Lane, specialist on such matter over at Oregon State offers the following suggestions on the subject of moths, their habits, and their care:

Actually, clothes moths never stop working in well heated houses, but the warm weather months are normally the season for extensive moth damage in neglected woolen garments. Infrequently worn and soiled clothing are most likely to be damaged.

For that closet, trunk or drawer space where woolen clothing is hung or stored, the clothing specialist recommends a thorough spray job using a 5 per cent DDT residual solution. If the solution is a non-staining oil, it may be sprayed directly on clothing without harm.

Closets, as well as closet or trunk walls, have holes including cracks and crevices must be covered for complete protection.

Miss Lane points out that moth eggs hatch in five days after they are laid by the adult female. Thus time is short between exposure and time in which damage may be done unless protective measures are taken. Larvae, the moth "worms," eat the woolen fibers; not the adult moths.

Likely places for moths to deposit eggs are in pants cuffs, collars, pocket flaps and garment seams.

With a residual type DDT spray, larvae hatched after the actual spray operation will be destroyed by coming in contact with dried spray left on walls or clothing. Although a white film may form on clothing, it will brush away readily when the clothing is to be worn, Miss Lane states. Protection from residual type DDT sprays will last for months depending upon exposure to air and how often the woodwork is cleaned.
