

Albany 'Loggers' and Float in Rose Parade

PORTLAND—A moss-covered log with logging hat and boat and an ax on top depicted Albany's forthcoming Timber carnival in the Portland Rose festival parade Friday. The float is shown above with orange shirted Albany "loggers" alongside waiting for the famed parade to start. The carnival is July 2, 3 and 4.

Agriculture Directors Favor State Trade Controls for Food

By Lillie L. Madsen
Farm Editor, The Statesman

Free trade within the United States—the world's greatest free trade area—comes in for a wide airing, handled most effectively, in the "Agriculture Bulletin," official publication of Oregon's Department of Agriculture, just off the press.

While it is agreed by the various states' agricultural commissioners, who are expressing their opinion, that some uniformity of regulations is needed, the majority seem to favor state rather than federal controls. All, too, are agreed that the laws should be kept as simple and free from complications as possible. As E. L. Peterson, Oregon's director, puts it, "The more regulations applied to any commodity and the more processes through which that commodity must go to meet regulatory requirements, the greater the cost of moving the commodity from the grower to consumer." He favors regulation only to protect the public, such as in disease and pest control.

C. R. Tully, executive vice president, Northwest Canners Association, admits that to persons or industries engaging in interstate trade, the task of keeping up with requirements of various state laws and regulations becomes a major undertaking.

Little Federal Regulation

Only in the cases of milk and nursery regulations, do the agriculturalists seem to favor federal regulation. Richard P. White, executive secretary of American Association of Nurserymen, points out that in his business the whole nation is the trading area, as he pleads for uniformity of all state laws.

"The nursery industry, as a part of the agricultural economy of the country, is opposed to any federal or state regulation not essential for the protection of the agricultural economy of a region or state," he said, adding that where it is necessary it would be better for the industry if "all state regulations or quarantines are uniformly written."

Needed in New York

C. Chester DuMond, New York agricultural commissioner, reports that federal regulations took some of the headache away in his state's case where part of the milk produced in six different states is required to meet the daily needs of the New York City consuming area.

However, Kenneth E. Carl, assistant chief, division of food and dairies in Oregon, says that dairy authorities and milk sanitarians quite generally agree that the adoption of uniform milk standards on a state level and the development of reciprocal milk control quality programs between states would be the greatest single benefit that could occur to the milk industry and the consuming public.

Uniformly Impossible

In the livestock industry, tendency is definitely toward state rather than federal control.

M. E. Knickerbocker, Oregon's chief of animal industry says that on a national basis, geographical conditions and the general plane of disease control are so varied between areas that it would appear to be impossible ever to attain complete uniformity of requirements of the interstate movement of livestock. He suggests instead that groups of contiguous states having the same conditions develop a schedule of requirements as have Oregon, Washington and Idaho.

Dr. Charles F. Haynes, Oregon state veterinarian, urges that great caution be taken not to create embargoes but only to regulate so far as health requirements are concerned, which A. A. Brock, California director of agriculture, endorses heartily in his statement that quarantine regulations be designed solely for the purpose of preventing or limiting introduction or spread of harmful pests, plant and animal diseases and weeds.

Brock does not agree with the attitude of many that if a pest occurs in a wide area and the majority of the producers have to contend with it, that those state or individual counties free from it be stopped from trying to remain free from it as long as possible.

A. K. Gardener, of Maine's Department of agriculture, sums it up well when he says that "to open doors and permit all cattle to cross state lines without restrictions would obviously tend to destroy incentives to control efforts in states where conditions are already unfavorable."

Dorena Dam Gate Tested

EUGENE, June 11 (AP)—Engineers have diverted waters of the Row river to test controls of one of five hydraulic gates at Dorena dam six miles east of Cottage Grove.

The $14,000,000 structure is scheduled for completion this October, although engineers said the contract does not call for completion until July, 1950.

Work started in 1941.

Telephone Office Changes in Albany Told by Manager

ALBANY — H. J. Albrich, manager of the Pacific Telephone Co., in Albany, has announced that a 10-year lease had been taken on the 50x135-foot concrete and steel building just completed by A. G. Senders at 315 Lyon street.

Albrich also stated that the business offices of the company which have been temporarily located in the Hotel Albany, would be moved over the week end, and ready for business next Monday in the new location.

The business office will use approximately 2,500 square feet of the building, the remaining space to be used for company vehicles and supplies. Public telephones for making either day or night calls and also a depository for after-hours payments, will be located in the vestibule of the new building.

12 Hurt as Buses Collide in Portland

PORTLAND, June 11 (AP)—An uptown collision of two passenger buses injured 12 persons here Friday, none seriously.

A Milwaukee bus of the Oregon Motor Stage lines and an Irvington bus of the Portland Traction company met at an intersection.

Nine of the injured were released after hospital treatment. Three others were held at the hospital for further checks.

The family received many gifts in a shower held during the afternoon. Mrs. Wiedeman is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Tom Keller of the Pioneer district.
