Plumed Ostrich Comeback

When Queen Elizabeth of England appeared in ostrich-plumed hats four years ago, she helped revive a fashion and an important South African industry, according to the office of foreign agricultural relations, U. S. department of agriculture. Today ostriches are a million dollar business in the Union of South Africa. Breeders and merchants there believe that the business may double if markets for feathers and skin are developed in the United States. At present 80 percent of the feathers and most of the skins are sold here where once the big buyers of these fathers were England and France.

Fashion has determined the ups and downs of the industry in the past. In the early 1900's world fashions favored ostrich feathers for hats, boas, fans and other costume decorations. Sale of the feathers averaged more than $7,000,000 a year from 1903 to 1913. Well over a million pounds of feathers were exported in 1913. The number of domesticated birds in privately owned herds was estimated at about 700,000.

After the first world war, ostrich plumes went out of style and the industry suffered accordingly. Many of the birds were killed off for meat. A feather cooperative attempting to revive the business in 1924 succeeded only in marketing to manufacturers of feather dusters for a few years.

By 1945 only about 14,000 of the big birds were left in South Africa. Then the Queen's plumed hats and studies on uses for ostrich skin started the revival. Ostrich skins are tough and do rubrum lilies. not stretch, so may be used for women's shoes, fancy handbags and luggage. Last year the number of birds had increased to 40,000, and production of feathers and skins was estimated at well over a million dollars. CLUB CALENDAR Bridal
