Apricots, Watermelon Rind Featured In Two Midsummer Canning Recipes

By Maxine Buren Statesman Woman's Editor

It's funny how, just when time comes for apricots, the grocers get out their large cans of pineapple and put a special price on them. This of course, invites and practically compels, the making of apricot-pineapple marmalade, one of the world's finest "spreads" according to many eating experts.

APRICOT-PINEAPPLE MARMALADE

5 pounds apricots
1 can pineapple, crushed
1 cup nuts
10 cups sugar
Remove seeds from apricots but do not skin them, arrange fruit and sugar in a shallow kettle in alternate layers. Let stand one hour then cook for about 20 minutes or longer until thick. Add nuts the last few minutes of cooking. Watch carefully to keep from burning.

Watermelons, those attractive and refreshing melons which appear in summer markets from somewhere, are good in pickle as well as fresh for eating. Here's a watermelon pickle, especially practical to use when the melon you bought wasn't quite as sweet and good to eat as you had predicted and there was a thick rind.

WATERMELON PICKLE

4 pounds rind (red trimmed off)
2 quarts cold water
1 tablespoon lime (calcium oxide from drugstore)
2 tablespoons whole allspice
2 tablespoons whole cloves
10 2-inch pieces of stick cinnamon
1 quart vinegar
1 quart water
4 pounds (8 cups) sugar
Trim off green from melon rind, cut pieces in 1 inch squares. Soak for an hour in the 2 quarts water in which lime has been dissolved. This is to firm the rind. Drain, cover with fresh water and cook until tender (may take considerable time) add more water as needed. Drain.

Put spices loosely in a thin clean cloth and tie tightly with string. Put into a kettle with vinegar sugar and the 1 quart of water. Bring to the boiling point, add melon and boil gently for about two hours. Remove spice, pack rind in clean hot sterile jars, fill with syrup and seal tightly.

You may let melon stand in syrup overnight and in the morning, remove bag and bring to a good rolling boil and seal.

On Etiquette

By Roberta Lee

Q. When should young boys and girls be trained to rise from their seats?

A. They should be taught this courtesy as soon as they are old enough to understand, to rise when visitors, or elderly persons enter the room.

Q. When a husband and wife are calling on friends, and one of them suggests that they had better be leaving, should the other protest?

A. No. This would give the impression that the one who makes the suggestion is bored.

Q. Is it required that honorary pallbearers wear special mourning suits?

A. No; any dark business suit is appropriate.
