Tweeds Prove Popular For Fall Fashions

Chiffon weight... Adele Simpson uses sheer tweed in a grey diamond weave for her fly-front coat dress with wing pockets.

City homespun... Ellen Brooke uses a multi-color striped tweed in navy, turquoise, olive and beige for suit with velvetene accents.

Mad plaid... Dashing reefer in winter-weight tweed combining turquoise, shocking pink and olive.

By Dorothy Roe
The 1950 fashion story runs to tweeds, newly glorified by American fabric manufacturers and served up in finishes as light as chiffon and as soft as silk.

Time was when the word "tweed" called to mind the stiff, scratchy woolens always used by novelists to clothe the lovable but careless he-man and invariably teamed with the smell of good tobacco.

Chiffon-weight tweeds shown in most major New York dress collections this fall made headlines because, while they had all the texture interest and richness of the old-fashioned variety, they draped as smoothly as satin and were feather-weight in the hand.

Americans always have had a sentimental fondness for good tweeds, and now they may indulge it to their hearts' content. For the new, soft tweeds are supple enough for evening gowns, smooth enough for coat dresses, admirable for suits and in heavier weights handsome for town-or-country coats.

This year you'll find a tweed weight for practically any purpose, and you'll find soft, muted colors with a misty, muted look that fit the mood of the times.

Some of the new tweeds have almost an indecent quality, others are big and bold in plaid patterns. Some are sheer, some are soft and warm.

While England and Scotland have held for many years the top reputation for fine tweeds, they will have to look to their laurels this year. American manufacturers are turning out tweeds so handsome and versatile that anyone may well be proud of the label—"Made in U.S.A."
