Dike Projects Progressing in Talbot Area

Several thousand feet of revetment will be put in above the Oregon Electric railroad bridge across the river where water flows around E. B. Henningsen island and along the mainland through the Henningsen ranch. The company is financing work 400 feet up the river from the trestle.

Harry Haley of Portland has the contract for the work. The drag lines and a bulldozer work around 11 hours a day. All the slopes are in and toe trench is about ready for the rock. The revetment is bank high and follows the contour of the river bank. Greely, Last winter, during high water, the river washed away acres of valuable land on the Henningsen, Enos Nelson and Elmo Brown places at this point. At one time, the railroad trestle was threatened when the river changed its course and started around the cement piers of the bridge and through the wooden piers.

Another flood control project on the north and south forks of the Santiam, southeast of Lewis, is about completed. Farmers along that stretch of the river are doing this work.
