Lions Hear Complexities of Compiling Laws

Updating of Oregon's compiled statutes is a complicated job, but one of value to the public as well as to state government and the legal profession, the Salem Lions club was told Thursday noon by Robert K. Cullen.

The speaker, a recodification expert from Wisconsin and Kentucky, is now directing the work of the Oregon code revision commission which was authorized by the last legislature.

Cullen pointed out that some 8,000 sections of Oregon law have been affected in the lawmaking of five Oregon legislatures since the latest compilation of laws was made, in 1940. While new laws and amendments are published after every legislative session, the relating of these to existing laws and the indexing of the accumulated laws takes place only about every 10 years.

Cullen said recodification makes state laws more accessible and understandable to the public, reduces litigation, enables lawyers to give safer and prompt advice, cuts costs of law books for courts and legislatures and improves the administration of justice.
