

MONMOUTH — Shown is the architect's sketch of the new library to be constructed in the near future at the Oregon College of Education here. The ultra-modern building was designed by Wolff and Phillips, Portland architects.

Construction to Start Soon
On $288,000 OCE Library

MONMOUTH, Jan. 12 — Oregon College of Education's new library, to be constructed on a site next to the administration building here soon, will present students with the finest in modern facilities for study and research. Cost is estimated at $288,000.

The main library floor will be devoted to five areas — reading, browsing, circulation and index, stacks and quiet study.

Facing the administration building will be the huge fan-shaped general reading room, nearly 60 feet deep from the lobby entrance to the commanding sweep of windows at the north side of the room.

Room for Browsing
Off to the right of the reading room will be a semi-circular browsing room, comfortably arranged with a large open fireplace and easy access to the general circulation desk and reserve book racks.

Near the center of the floor the lobby opens into an area housing the card index, which in turn leads to the stack room, about 25 feet deep and extending across the building for over 60 feet. There will be room in this section of stacks for 20,500 books, 18,000 more volumes will be stored elsewhere.

Behind the stack room there will be a quiet study room about 22 by 50 feet where conditions conducive to intense quiet concentration will prevail. Joining this study will be a small sound-proofed typing room where typewriters will be available for student use.

Work rooms, offices for the library staff and an Oregon history room 20 by 21 feet will also be located on the main floor.

On the lower floor other library facilities will include a large work room with stack space for 18,000 more books, a delivery area and an outside return book chute.
