McKay Urges Preparation of Bills for Legislature Speeded

Early preparations of bills for the 1951 legislative session was urged on several state departments Saturday by Gov. Douglas McKay. He conferred with 20 department heads under his appointive power.

"We want to do everything possible to expedite operations of the 1951 legislative session," Governor McKay told members of his official family. The governor referred particularly to the 1949 legislative session which lasted 97 days, longest in the history of the state.

Blamed for Delay
"It has been charged that state department heads were partly responsible for the length of the 1949 session," Governor McKay continued, "because of their delay in preparing and submitting bills."

The governor added that the length of the last legislature discouraged many of its members from running for re-election this year. "We don't want our legislative personnel restricted to wealthy persons," Governor McKay averred, "but to a sound cross-section of the people."

Views on Ragweed
Discussions at the conference ranged from general department economy down to an exchange of views on ragweed. State Health Officer Dr. Harold Erickson pointed out that the infestation of ragweed in Clackamas county would spread to the extent where health would be jeopardized. Such a situation, he said, would prove costly to the state and might curtail materially the 1950 tourist trade.

Virtually all state department heads at the conference said they would join in the campaign to wipe out the ragweed menace.

The economy talk was sparked by Governor McKay's suggestion that "we aim toward thrift rather than frills and extravagance in state government."

Other similar meetings will be held monthly, Governor McKay announced.
