Master Plan for Salem's Future

Fire trucks figure in $133,500 portion of a $5,300,000 master plan for Salem municipal needs in the coming 10 years. Pictured above is the 25-year-old aerial ladder truck which would be replaced if the program is adopted; below, left to right, a hose truck in service since 1913 but used now only in extreme emergency; a 22-year-old heavy 1,000-gallon pumper for which parts are getting scarce, and a comparatively modern 600-gallon pumper of 1940 vintage, similar to new equipment proposed. III. Proposal Would Modernize Fire Equipment

(Editor's note: The Statesman presents in this series of articles details of a 10-year plan of development designed by the Salem city administration to meet the needs of a fast-growing city. Most of the projects in this master plan will require special financing and hence will be submitted to the voters for approval.)

By Robert E. Gangware, City Editor, The Statesman

There's a polished red hook and ladder outfit which has captured the fancy of boys and other curbstone firefighters in Salem for the past quarter-century.

It has been in service for the Salem fire department 25 years, 3 months, 3 weeks and some odd days -- hard rubber tires, chain drive mechanism and all.

Several other which have seen the modern motor age pass them up may be put to pasture before another decade rolls by.

For they are considered for replacement in one phase of a Salem municipal master plan embracing some $5,300,000 in projects the city administration has drafted as community needs in the next 10 years.

Fire department new equipment would account for only $133,500 of the total, but like another $5,000,000 worth it probably would require extra-budgetary financing.

The voting public is being apprised of the various projects from which it will have to choose, somewhere along the line, what to underwrite by special taxes or bond issues.

Estimates Given Here's what $133,500 would buy in modern firefighting equipment, as estimated by Fire Chief W. P. Roble and incorporated in the master plan by City Manager J. L. Franzen:

A $85,000 aerial ladder truck to replace the present 1924 model whose long-dried wooden ladders are by now eyed -- and used -- only cautiously by the fire department. The old ladders, manually operated by at least two men, cannot be used to the full 85-foot height.

The proposed new ladder truck, to fill adequately the functions of saving life and running hose to high places, would have a modern motor and transmission system, pneumatic tires, faster turning radius, more reliable ladders with hydraulic hoisting apparatus requiring only one-man control.

Advantage Cited A big advantage of this and other new equipment would be in standardized parts for the hook-and-ladder must be specifically ordered from Columbus, Ohio. Last year when a broken fan blade tore through its motor at a Fairview home fire, the old truck was out of service 10 days until parts were received.

Here are the other items in the $133,500 firefighting equipment program:

Two 750-gallon pumpers at $15,000 each. These would be triplecombination rigs more maneuverable than the present 1,000-gallon pumper and more generally useful than any truck at present.

Besides the pumping capacity, equipment on these trucks would include a booster tank for 3/4-inch hose, some ladders and the 2 1/2-inch hose. The trucks would give the north and the south fire stations something to really work with.

One of the new pumpers would replace a 22-year-old, 1,000-gallon, 6-ton vehicle with two-wheel brakes.

City Service Truck What else? A "city service truck" at $28,500 whose only counterpart in the fire department today is a home made salvage truck which, despite limitations, already has earned the plaudits of fire victims whose roofs have been patched or property partly rehabilitated after a fire.

This truck would store life ropes, hand ladders, salvage equipment and a 750-gallon pumper to boot. It would go to east Salem station, as its use is best in residential sections.

Remaining $40,000 of the firefighting equipment cost would go for city expansion needs and would tie in with another part of the master plan which envisions community center buildings including fire stations at five locations. Three would roughly correspond with the three outlying fire stations now; the other two would service fast-growing residential areas in Englewood and Silvertown road areas.

As it is now, the east Salem fire station must serve everything east of the Southern Pacific tracks plus the state capitol area, and the north Salem station serves the broad area north of Market street.

The $40,000 item would provide a 15,000 pumper (750-gallon, general purpose vehicle as cited above) and $5,000 worth of personal and station equipment for additional firemen at each of the two new fire stations.
