2 Salem Men Develop Movie Projector Aide

Two Salem men have developed a carbon-saving device for use on motion picture projector illuminators. The new product, already tested and offered on the national and foreign market, was invented and patented by John E. (Bill) Marr, local radio businessman and operator of the Salem Drive-in theatre, with the assistance of Leo D. Reimann, head of Northwest Research and Development Corp. here.

Boxoffice magazine, widely recognized trade publication for the theatre industry, explained and pictured the device in its April 1 issue. Sixty queries from theatre owners already have been received since then.

Known as Full Run Carbon saver, the new product consists of a three-inch steel extender which screws into a carbon rod with help of a wrench and V-block units.

Positive and negative carbon rods are used in movie projectors for the electrical arc to provide intense illumination in projecting the film on a screen.

The new extender device invented by Marr, permits the use of the 9 to 12 inch carbons down to within one-half inch. Because the clamp and water jacket now occupy part of the rod's length and because carbons cannot be changed in the middle of film reels, ordinary use of the carbon rods has left several inches of each unused.

Reimann said the carbon saver has been used for several months at the Salem Drive-in theatre, where a 50 per cent saving in carbon has been effected. He also said it has been tried successfully in Europe where all carbons must be imported from U. S. He added that the heavy shipping weight of carbon is a factor adding to foreign interest in the new product.
