Washing of Walls Best Done From Bottom Up to Remove Dirt and Grime

By Sue Gardner

There's a trick to washing walls so they will not streak or smudge. A large painting company's research department has come out with a method that will be a big help to housewives who want to remove dirt and grime now that the weather is nice and the job can be done with windows open.

You will get the best results by washing the walls from the bottom up, reversing the usual process. It seems that when you wash the walls from the top down, you tend to streak it so deeply that subsequent washings fail to take out the marks. A good mild soap such as linsed oil soap, which you can buy at your local dealer, is the best to use. Semi-glosses and flats can be washed as well as enameled.

Invest in a good natural or synthetic sponge for this job. Any soft sponge that will take up water readily will do the trick. A most effective job can be done by using two sponges, one for applying the cleaning solution and one for rinsing with clear water.

Any mild commercial brand of washing compound will work on deep colored flats as well as on regular oil paints. Be careful not to make the solution any stronger than called for by the directions on the package. You will need the full strength recommended for the kitchen where grease and oil becomes deposited from cooking and boiling.

Prepare the washing solution according to the instructions, have your sponges ready and begin at the floor and wash up to the ceiling. Apply the solution to the surface with the first sponge, rinse with the second until clean. When the surface is clean, squeeze out the sponges and wipe over the surface again. Do not rub with a dry cloth, but allow to dry. Take a small area at a time and wash to a natural break in the wall. Wait at least one month before attempting to wash over newly painted areas.
