Spring Calls Army Dredge to Salem Channel

Come spring to the Willamette river and also comes the U. S. army engineer dredge to clear out the channel, shovel away the bars built up by winter freshets and heap the gravel and rocks on the banks of the river. Above is the dredge, center background, hard at work on the west side of the river. In the center may be seen the turbulent, tricky riffles set up by a long, curving gravel bar built up on the river's curve near the Salem Boat House docks, foreground. The ripping currents set up by agitation threaten the dock installations and bar is one which river men say should be removed by the dredge. (Statesman photo.)
