After-Harvest Care Urged for Berry Fields

By Lillie L. Madsen
Farm Editor, The Statesman

After-harvest care given strawberry fields can influence next year's production greatly, county agents throughout the Willamette valley are telling strawberry growers this week.

Bud formation for the next crop takes place from sometime in August until late fall in the Marshall strawberries, Leon Garolan, Clackamas county agent, told growers in his area.

Topping fields is practiced when there are destructive pests to control. In the case of strawberry crown moth, which lays eggs on the old leaves, topping is very important. Topping, when practiced, needs to be done immediately after berry harvest. Late topping usually results in a decrease in fruit yields the following year. In many areas, strawberry growers report, topping has been a standard practice for years. However, in other localities it is losing favor.

Cultivation of fields following harvest should be shallow, county agents are telling Willamette valley growers. The real purpose of this is to control weeds and deep cultivation tends to destroy valuable feeder roots.

Although use of fertilizers do not always show the same results in all fields, common practice with a number of Willamette valley strawberry growers is to apply around 200 pounds of treble superphosphate per acre in late August or early September. The fertilizer is placed in bands in the soil about four or five inches deep.

In early spring, additional fertilizer such as 16-20 is applied to produce adequate top growth where this is necessary. First fall rains provide adequate moisture to make the late summer application of fertilizer, available to the plants.

Where irrigation is practiced, fertilizers can be applied earlier than where there is no irrigation. In the former, applications can be applied soon after harvest is completed. Applications of water timed for August and September will make fertilizers available early to the plants.

Growers are also being reminded that it is necessary to keep bait in fields so long as adult weevil are present. Eggs from these late weevil hatch into white larvae which feed on the strawberry plant roots all winter, causing heavy damage, Don Rasmussen, Marion county extension agent, reports.

School Board Orders New Buses Bought

Salem district school board has ordered the purchase of two new school buses from Truck Sales and Service Co. It was announced Monday by C. C. Ward, schools' business manager.

A board committee studied bids following a recent directors' meeting. It decided to accept the local Truck Sales firm's offer for a 54-passenger GMC bus with Wayne body at $5,807, and a 66-passenger GMC bus with Union City body, at $6,451.

These will replace two older, smaller buses which will be retained on a standby basis. The committee decided against trading in the old buses after looking over the alternate bids which figured in such a trade-in.

Salem district now has 20 buses, with the additions. The school board is preparing now to call for bids on additions to McKinley, Richmond and Highland schools. These bids probably will be called within a few days, Ward indicated.

County Given Jurisdiction in Bridge Case

Any compromise involving taxes due the State of Oregon on the Oregon end of the Longview bridge would have to be negotiated with Columbia county and not the state tax commission, it was declared Monday by Carl Chambers, in charge of the assessment and taxation division.

The bridge is owned and operated by the Washington State toll bridge authority. Taxes now due Columbia county from the Washington toll bridge authority aggregate approximately $70,000 for the years 1948 and 1949.

The 1950 assessment of the Oregon end of the bridge, totaling $1,100,000, was protested by Washington state. At a recent hearing before the Oregon Tax Commission Washington officials branded the 1950 assessment as unreasonable, with indication that the assessment might be carried into the courts.

Chambers said any compromise of the tax due the state probably would not be legal until court action has been launched.
