to Jim Aiken and the Webfoots this week and save them their trip to Los Angeles. We've yet to see or hear a word from Sanders on the possibilities of a Uke win over Oregon in their opener Saturday. But remembering too easily how annually impossible it seems to be for northern division teams to win in the Los Angeles Coliseum, Sanders' moaning and groaning can be taken as so much unnecessary noise. Then on the other hand, if the guy is right it will be extremely nice to have one of the northern elevens finally put the squash on that Coliseum jinx. . . . Add to those prep elevens who must have something sizeable this season Hank Nilsen's Eugene Axemen. Medford's div well fixed campaign this year, but the Axemen upended Lee Ragsdale's southerners four touchdowns to three last week. Consequently the Eugenes must be tough. . . .

Individual Stars Do Loom on Viking Eleven

Pre-season predictions by Messrs, Mort, Juran and Petersen at the Vik Villa held that no individual stars loomed for their team this season, such as was Jim Rock last year. But from the exhibi-tion he gave Friday night against Cleveland, the red-headed, 161-pound Tommy Kerns, a transfer from Marion, Ia., could make his masters eat their words. Kerns looks like a kid who loves to ramble with a football and has the equipment with which to ramble. He was so impressive in his debut that the mentors already have handed him the starting right halfback position, and have moved Gene Jones, another impressive mail-carrier Friday night, to the left half spot. Both Kerns and Jones were battling for the right half berth during pre-season practices.

The Vikings didn't exactly look like world-beaters in their debut, but did display enough to hint that with additional work they'll be an interesting outfit to watch. Boss Mort may come up with one of the best running attacks Salem teams have had in a long time. Kerns, Jones and two or three other Viks proved against Cleveland they can mobile. Were they given even a smattering of downfield blocking by the linemen in that game they could have gone all the way on three
