Harnessing of A-Power Said Long Way Off

Harnessing atomic energy to its full peacetime potential is a long way off, it was asserted in Salem Monday by a Reed college physicist, Dr. William L. Parker.

Parker was one of the instructors designated by the atomic energy commission to train Oregon leaders in radiological monitoring last summer.

The war situation is postponing the day, said Parker, when atomic energy will be used in peaceful ways to provide power. But war or no war, much remains to be done before this peacetime atomic use materializes, he added.

Dr. Parker explained the following drawbacks, in addition to the influence of war:

1. The net loss in fissionable materials in the process of creating plutonium must be overcome, lest the raw materials be depleted.
2. Either new uranium deposits must be found or methods of extracting it from low grade ore must be improved.
3. A way must be found to dispose safely of radioactive ashes left in the process of creating atomic power.
4. Production pace would be insufficient as things now stand, as power now produced industrially over the U. S. is the equivalent of an atom bomb explosion every 24 minutes.

Dr. Parker spoke before a Salem Chamber of Commerce luncheon which marked the official opening of the annual Christmas seal sale of the Marion county tuberculosis association. Frank B. Bennett introduced the speaker, explained the TB campaign and presented its leaders to the chamber audience of 200. Vice President Russel Pratt presided.

"We have the opportunity to participate in making a very significant gift to the United Nations," said Mrs. McKay. "It is a gift not large in money value, but one expressing our interest and faith in an organization that could prove to be the avenue of a better and more peaceful world."

Assisting Mrs. McKay is Rex Putnam, superintendent of public instruction, who will supervise organization of the schools in the drive. Linn C. Smith of the U. S. National bank in Salem, is serving as treasurer. Schools were urged to contribute before December 15.
