Soup's On

Telephone Request for "Perpetual" Soup Stock Inspires Some Research

By Maxine Buren
Statesman Woman's Editor

A telephone call from what sounded like a young male, requesting a recipe for a "perpetual" soup stock, sent me to the old cookbooks for information. Of course what I gave him was not directly from an early French book, and neither was it "perpetual" — for old French recipes don't fit into modern living, and soup will spoil even in these refrigerated days.

It seems that the inspiration for the soup stock was a new deep well cooker, which appeared to him to be the perfect place to keep the makings for good soup. But being a place where the heat will be held for a long time, inviting bacterial growth, we advised him to do the cooking in the pot, but store it in a refrigerator.

Keep It Cool
Maybe they weren't so closely acquainted with all the little bacteria when French cooks kept the stock for a long period, but now-a-days we discourage them as much as possible.

In an English cookbook we find that "The art of good wholesome, palatable soups, without great expenses, which is so well understood in France and in other countries, has hitherto been much neglected in England, yet presents no difficulties with a little practice."

The author advises against allowing servants to make soup stock as it will not be as delicate as if prepared by oneself.

My old French cookbook, on the other hand, offers a recipe like this, with no mention of the servant problem:

SOUP STOCK
Take six pounds of beef or a leg-bone of beef, pour over it six quarts of water or more, in proportion to the quantity of meat, let stew slowly for an hour to draw out the gravy and skim when almost to a boil! But who wants to have soup with six pounds of beef?

In a more practical modern book we find that the author in discussing soups and stock says:

"Most old recipes for soup stock put the dish among the luxuries by calling for 5 pounds or so of lean beef and 2½ pounds of narrow bone, but by following the French custom of pot au feu (anglicized means "icebox soup"), good soup stock may be kept on hand by utilizing scraps. Keep bits of bones, cooked meat, chicken carcasses, fish and roasts trimmings; vegetable parings, outer leaves of lettuce, unshapely tomatoes, celery tops, peapods, parsley and so forth for soup stock. All liquid from canned vegetables should be added."

Some Good Pointers
Further discussion reveals that lamb and mutton should be used sparingly as a strong flavor is developed, and pork is too rich and fat. If scraps are insufficient purchase a soupbone or oxtail and some soup vegetables.

A general rule is to use twice as much water as meat, bone and fat, adding vegetables as desired. It's well to soak meat for an hour or so to bring out juices.

Meat from fresh bones requires about four hour's simmering at which time it should be reduced about half in bulk. Cooked meat as a beginner of course requires less length in cooking.

Use but little seasoning until just before serving, as it is difficult to gauge the amount needed. Salting meat draws out juices. Soup is colored by caramel syrup, (burned sugar loses most of its sweetness) or Kitchen Bouquet.

There are few other types food which can be varied so widely or challenge the ingenuity of the cook as does soup. Though wintertime is the season thought of as best for soup we think a nice bowl of soup tastes mighty good at noon on a spring day after a morning working outdoors.
