Though strawberriy fields are bustling with pickers in bright bandanas, big trucks being loaded with overflowing berry crates, watch for your best opportunity to buy the berries, It's usually best to wait awhile until the berries are at their best, and the way to do that is to ask your dealer or grower for the best moment to buy. Strawberries used to go mostly into cans, now freezing's the usual way of preserving them, both commercially and at home. Of course every woman with experience, has her own preferences

CHOOSE CONTAINER We have our own little way of preparing them for the freezer, and between us girls, we like our own berries pretty well. We buy our berries direct from a neighbor (shame on us, not having our own berry patch!) and get them into the freezer within an hour of the time they're picked. This is an important factor in the delivery of flavor, for they mold easily and deterioration begins as soon as the berries are picked. So get them as fresh as possible.

Our system is a simple one, we set a large dishpan in the backyard, set the hose into the bottom of it, letting water flow gently. We dump in two to three boxes of berries a a time, move them around a moment and then scoop them gently out, picking them over as we go. The water of course continues to replace itself with no mess as it runs into the grass.

We cut each berry, the larger ones twice or more, the smaller only once so juices will penetrate. Our berries have been hulled, but if not, this is the time to do the hulling, after washed and before being cut. Cut directly into a large bowl. We stir in the sugar gently, turning berries as little as possible and allowing 1/2 to % cup sugar per quart of berries.
OUR OWN WAY

Packing them into containers, we leave lids off awhile until they settle. One can push or shake them down to get more into container. Leave some head room and put into the freezer as quickly as possible.

We have usually used rigid containers, but this year plan to put even the strawberries down in plastic bags because our freezer is not large and the bags of food pack better. However, many pre-fer the other type containers, and actually the rigid ones are recommended by the experts.

Because we must always save time, we do not label ours, if the containers are transparent, however again the experts say "do label them" and they also recommend putting on the date. This year, because ours were so successful last year, we plan to can more strawberries.

Years ago Mother found that canned strawberries were her children's favorite, but later they became less popular. Within the past few years, however, we have found that berries must be sweetened more than the amount of required for most other fruits in order to be at their best and we like them again. Here's a recipe we publish each year, but one which we used again last season and found very much to our liking.

CANNERY METHOD—STRAWBERRIES

Into each kettle put 4 boxes washed berries and 2 cups sugar. Toss around to mix, let stand overnight. Next morning bring to a boil, let cool. Bring to a rolling boil the second time, then pack in hot sterilized jars and seal.

This slow method allows the berries to absorb the sugar and they should remain bright colored and not float. Do not put more than the suggested amount of berries in one kettle.
