Velvet Grass Masquerades As Crabgrass

By Lillie L. Madson

Farm Editor, The Statesman

That pest you have been cursing in the lawn as crabgrass may not be that after all, says Virgil Freed, Oregon State college weed research expert, in a release from the college Monday.

While nine out of 10 gardeners believe it is crabgrass it is just as apt to be velvet grass, Freed reports. He adds that 90 per cent of the state's home owners who would swear they have a crabgrass problem are confusing it with some other weedy pest.

Both velvet and crab grasses are pests and either one is bad enough. Each in its own way is difficult to get rid of.

Yet here's the rub, according to Freed: chemicals which are sold specifically as crabgrass sprays don't work on velvet grass. This means lots of times when home-owners complain that they "have sprayed and sprayed" to no avail, they have been using a spray which will not do the job if the grass is velvet and not crab. In most cases there is nothing wrong with the spray materials. They'll work fine on the right grass.

Part of the blame for this mistake is due to the fact, Freed states, that "reams have been written about crabgrass. Actually it is a lawn pest which is more widespread in the east and mid-west, while velvet grass is comparatively unknown here as such."

The weed expert says that one way to tell the difference is this: Crabgrass is an annual which starts as an individual plant and spreads by creeping. You'll see it most prominently in late summer.

Velvet grass, on the other hand, is a perennial which tends to form clumps of a different hue on the lawn. It has pale green leaves which stand erect.

Digging out the clumps is one way to get rid of velvet grass. Freed suggests doing it early in the spring. Another eradication method is to mix 1 pint of IPC in 7 pints of stove oil and spray it on the clumps through a small watering can.

Camp Offers Lake Outings

Special lake outings for groups of older boys now attending Salem YMCA's Camp Silver Creek are planned for this week and next, according to directors.

Today 15 boys will be taken to Pamela lake and another 15 to Duffy lake, both on the Skyline trail, for camping out and hiking until Friday.

Next Tuesday some 15 boys will be taken to Suttle lake for canoeing on the lake and hiking to return to camp Thursday. This is the first time the camp has offered a canoe outing, and instruction is being given this week by Roth Holtz, camp director, who has had considerable experience with the craft. Aiding in the instruction is Ray Taylor of Salem boathouse.

Transportation for both special events will be provided by Cornelius Bateson of Pratum.
