Designing Woman

IT MAY BE A BENCH If the word bench to you means no more than a bleak, nondescript slab of wood, you're not up on the latest in furniture. The bench today is furniture of importance, and comfort and style. It may be the piece of furniture that's missing at your house, — the extra seat where there's no room for more chairs, the best idea for the choice spot in front of the fireplace, the only thing that can go in front of the widest window. Benches are now included in the designs of nearly all top furniture designers, and at the recent fall preview shows they reached a new high in style and comfort. The huge doughnut bench Edward J. Wormley designed was a stand-out. It's big enough to seat three or four people and was shown in rich black leather. Mr. Wormley also designed a new smaller bench to add to his many long ones. The sketch may suggest foot stool size, but the seat is as large as the seat of a large lounge chair. Jens Risom's new bench is as soft and comfortable as a chair seat and has a smart shaped base of black metal.

THE RIGHT COMBINATION

The answer to that frequently-asked question "Can I mix periods, different styles and periods effectively?" is an emphatic YES! But it must be done discriminately. There should be a relationship of feeling in the styles that are combined to preserve a sense of unity. For instance: in formal groupings, Chippendale and Adams pieces mix well with Louis XV. They all have an affinity in line and design, all have rich mahogany or walnut satin finishes that call for the luxurious fabrics associated with formal rooms. Pennsylvania Dutch blends effectively with provincial Early American in informal groupings... both naturally ally themselves with homeseat materials—gingham, chintz or sailcloth. Always place pieces together that are proportionate in scale. Small delicate chairs near small tables and chests. Large tables with huge davenport. Avoid no-tory by not using equal amounts of the same periods. Note how the one Modern cabinet-combination in bleached mahogany gives smart accent to traditional room sketched above. Simple lines of lounge chairs and traditional mahogany table are repeated in Lawson sofa. Entire room is unified by simple color scheme of green and yellow. Furniture something which should be bought with care. You need friendly help from people interested in your home. And that's what you get from us. Come in anytime... and just browse around.
