On Etiquette

By Roberts Lee
Q—When playing bridge, is it proper for the player who has won the bid to pass his over for his partner's inspection before he begins playing?
A. No, this is exceedingly rude. In some cases, it would appear that you are gloating over your particular hand, and in any case it is a thoughtless delay of the game on your part.
Q. Should a girl ever send a gift to a man whose she has been "dating" and whom she especially likes?
A. Not unless she is engaged to the man, and then the only gifts necessary are Christmas and on his birthday.
Q. Should a guest smoke at the dinner table in a home, if the hostess has not provided ash trays?
A. It is better not to do so.

Meat Controls Unfair, Val-Pac Manager Tells Salem Lions

Government controls will not work for the meat packing industry because meat is highly perishable and the meat processing industry, operating on a small margin of profit, is highly competitive, G. F. Chambers, president and general manager of Valley Packing company, told the Salem Lions club Thursday noon at Marion hotel.

Chambers said the average margin of profit for meat packers, at 1 per cent on the sales dollar, last year was one of the lowest of the nation's industries.

Packers can make a fair profit if not bound by OPS controls, "by selling a lot to make a little," but since controls went into effect packers have suffered terrific losses, Chambers said.

Meat prices are high in Salem and on the Pacific coast because population has increased more than production, of meat in the west, Chambers said. The public cannot buy all the meat it wants without drawing from midwest markets. Shipping of the product brings higher prices.

Public attention came to the price of meat because it is used every day, Chambers said, and politicians have found it "more astute to make a few meat packers mad than to make a lot of the public mad."

Packers took "tremendous losses" in the past quarter since controls took effect, the speaker said. Large midwest packers report as much as 50 per cent reduction in beef killings over last year, one large plant is to be shut down one week in four because they can't afford to kill in compliance with regulations, and another plant reports a net loss of $1,700,000 in three months, Chambers said. Valley Packing company has reduced beef processing by 26 per cent.

Meat production must be expanded instead of being reduced as it is under present regulations, he said, to keep the cost down.

Meat markets must charge high prices for the better cuts because "a steer is not all steak," the packing official said. Beef on the hoof is bought at a flat price for the whole animal but little can be obtained by the processor for hide, tallow and many cuts, Chambers pointed out.

Of the full price, the producer receives about 49 per cent, the processor and retailer receive 51 per cent from which expenses are taken before the finished cuts and salable parts reach the consumer, Chambers said. The net profit left for the packer is about 1 per cent.

Pole Kept from North Pole By Red Tape

FAIRBANKS, Alaska, Sept. 20 —(AP)—If it's called the North Pole there ought to be a pole there. So reasoned Alaska Workman Stanley Garson. He built one, painted it like a barber pole and asked the air force to drop it at the top of the world.

That's where the trouble started. The 58th weather reconnaissance squadron which makes routine flights over the earth's northern icy bald head hum-hawed over Garson's request, then said today:

The 9 foot, 300 pound pole is too big. The E-28s of the squadron are converted for long distance flying and gas tanks obstruct the bomb bay doors.

To be dropped at all, Garson would have to cut about three feet off the pole.

The barber pole would be of little geographical significance since the North Pole is on drifting ice and the wooden one would soon shift off center.

Undiscouraged, the Point Barrow oil exploration worker who made a special trip here to put across his pole project said he'd try to get an O.K. from air force bigwigs in Washington.
