Come Over for a Whaleburger Says Norwegian Attache's Wife

By JANE EADS

WASHINGTON (AP)—It's a whale of a whale dinner friends get at the home of the Magne Oppedal here these days.

Fisheries attache of the Norwegian Embassy, Mr. Oppedal is interested in introducing whale meat to Washingtonians, and it's a frequent specialty on the Oppedal table.

"Whale meat, Mr. Oppedal says, is being tried out in New York and the middle-west, but so far is available only to restaurants and clubs and not yet on the market. It is imported only from Norway. Some people must acquire a taste for it; others take to it right off, and some will never like it, he says. Whale is neither fish nor fowl. It's mammal, in case you don't know.

"We learned to use it at home during the last war when meat was scarce, and we are very fond of it," Mr. Oppedal told me. "Actual-ly, it's a much better buy than meat, and because it contains a certain amount of iodine is even more nutritious."

"It tastes something like buffalo, or other wild game," Mrs. Oppedal added. Her favorite way of preparing it is like filet mignon, smothered in onions. She also makes it into meat balls and cooks it like a beef roast. This way she browns about three pounds of the lean meat on both sides in a frying pan, seasons it with salt and pepper, covers it with sour cream and bakes it about an hour.

"It's a real treat, tender and very delicious," she said. Taking it naturally are the three Oppedal boys, aged seven, nine and 12, who Mr. Oppedal says are more American than Norwegian after three years in this country. They are equally fond of hot dogs.

Whales whose meat is used for human consumption come only from the coastal waters off Norway and are not the Atlantic variety. The catch is brought in by 60-foot vessels.

"These whales are small-toothed and weigh only from 1,000 to 2,000 pounds," he said. "Some of the meat is canned, but it is excellent also for freezing. To be good, the meat must be a dark, bloody red."

The new catch of coastal whales will start early in 1952. The larger whales which are used for fats and oils and other purposes are brought in by other fleets from the Atlantic.
