Civil Defense Workers Hear Ex-Londoner

"In modern war the front line may be your front door," was the warning given by Robert Harris, who lived in Southeast London during the blitz and now resides in Salem. He was speaking at a meeting of civil defense workers at the Bush School last night.

Harris told numerous personal experiences he had as police officer and defense worker in London and strongly urged organization and training against war emergency. He warned against complacency and said an enemy might bomb Salem if only to help destroy the people's morale.

Preceding his talk a sound film was shown of the bombing of the City of London in late December, 1940 when the heart of the old city was destroyed.

Capt. Wallace S. Wharton, chief of Marion County Civil Defense, presided.

Doctor Pictures Mental Health Advancements

Mental health programs have developed from insane hospital betterment to early prevention of trouble in individuals, Salem Rotary Club was informed Wednesday.

Dr. Henry Schumacher, San Francisco, regional director of the mental health program for the federal government, declared that a widespread community effort is essential in such work.

He lauded Dr. Willard J. Stone, Marion County Public Health officer, for making the community aware of problems and for working with schools and courts.

Noting that mental health has surpassed contagious diseases as the nation's top public health problem, Dr. Schumacher declared that lack of good inter-personal relationships is basic to international problems.

The mental health movement started about a half-century ago with correction of situations in asylums, and Schumacher said this brought "tremendous progress."

Then World War I brought numerous breakdowns of the minds of young people. Study of this situation showed that stress could break the mind of anyone, with varying breaking points depending largely on early environment. This led to the second stage of the movement—child guidance clinics, aimed principally at reduction of juvenile delinquency.

But clinical action proved too late to help delinquents, said Schumacher, so a preventive program was launched. This he described as dealing in education, in way with those who deal with persons—parents, teachers and others closely associated with children.

This is done through pre-natal classes, well-child conferences, teacher instruction.

Community action is essential, the speaker asserted, because for every child that breaks down in his social relationships many others are on the verge. Studying why one does can help to prevent trouble for others.

Arguments in Fraternities Case Heard

First arguments in a case involving the limiting of Portland high school fraternities and sororities to a single school were heard Wednesday by the State Supreme Court.

The case stems from a ruling of the Portland school district which said the fraternities and sororities could not be citywide. It is appealed from a Multnomah Circuit Court decision of Judge Charles H. Combs who ruled in favor of the school district action.

It is the first time that the high court has heard a case testing the 1909 law banning secret societies from high schools.

A group of parents and society members brought the original suit to obtain an injunction to stop the school district's order. Judge Combs dismissed the case.

In other action, the Court refused to decide whether the Governor has authority to place the state on daylight saving time when not all border states have it.

The Supreme Court said it would be necessary for the Oregon State Grange which has requested the court's opinion to wait and file suit when and if the Governor orders on daylight saving time when the Grange filed the suit last summer, but the state had returned to standard time before the court could hear the case.

Hearings on the Wayne LeRoy Long sentencing were also heard by the Court.

The Court granted a new trial in an automobile accident damage suit filed by Mary Hall against Roger Cornett and Alvin N. Cornett, upholding a new trial order of Douglas Circuit Judge Carl E. Wimberly. He set aside a verdict of a Douglas County jury which awarded damages of $1,007 to the Cornetts.
