Monmouth-Area Clay Shows Promise for Use in Ceramics

Statesman News Service
MONMOUTH—It's more than just mud—the soil around Monmouth and Independence, that is. An Independence teacher and his pupils have proven that clays in this area have very good possibilities for use in ceramic production. Frank Hudson, teacher at Henry Hill School, Independence, has guided a group of eighth-grade students through a thorough exploration of the clay. Some fine examples of ceramic work have resulted. Working with them was John Horns, assistant professor of arts at Oregon College of Education, Monmouth.

Beginning with easily-obtained types of clay, the group endeavored to learn the qualities of the material through practical test and experience. Which types of structures were possible with it, how it had to be molded, whether larger articles must be punctured to allow escape of entrapped air, and how the material would take color and glaze were all determined by test objects. Can Be Carved. It was discovered that the clay baked with a texture which allowed carving to be used as decoration and to eliminate minor cracks which develop. Large masses of Independence clay can be fired without a fine finish, which allowed production of articles of household use and decoration. Progressing through the experimental stages to production, the group has made many small and large objects and figures, coloring and glazing them in a very attractive manner. An exhibit of the products resulting from the group's work was recently held in the Henry Hill School. Those viewing it would agree that "it's more than just mud!"
