On the floor of the valley the stubble fields shine golden in the sunlight. On the hills that border the lowlands the pastures are burned brown. Here and there a combine harvester labors early and late, trying to catch up with the calendar. The tired earth, its seasonal fecundity spent, lies prone to welcome the life-renewing rains. For it is late August, the dog days of the year, when time seems to government. stand still, but when nature sets its signals for a change of season.

best. There is no spring in the high mountains. Winter holds its grip tight, with wrappings of snow and ice about the mountain peaks. Then suddenly the blazing sun breaks its icy fingers, the snow fields recede and summer carpets the alpine parks with avalanche heather. Flowers must make haste to bloom in the short season which summer brings to the mountains. The snow melt dries off quickly, the soil soon parches, and frost waits only a favorable moment to recover its dominion. Even now the clouds are forming their regiments and battalions around the high peaks. Shorfening days make Note Being Decoded briefer the sun's warm beneficence. ## Edward Piasecki, D.A. Young Killed Near Newport Bar

W. H. Paulus Fights Way to Beach

NEWPORT - Two prominent Salem attorneys, Donald A. Young, 58, and Edward K. Piasecki, 72, were swept to their deaths in the fog-shrouded Pacific Saturday when their boat capsized in heavy waves at the entrance to Yaquina Bay.

The third occupant of the craft, William H. Paulus, vice president of Paulus Bros. Cannery at Salem, fought his way to the beach and was taken to Toledo Hospital suffering from severe shock and injured shoulder. He was not seriously hurt. Young's body was found tossing in the surf more than a mile to the south. There were few marks on the body and Coastguardsmen administered artificial respiration for nearly three hours until Coroner Frank Parker pronounced him dead. He appeared to have died of shock or a blow on the head rather than drowning. He was in the water about 45 minutes. Young was president of the Salem Senators Baseball Club.

Piasecki's body was not found. The three men were aboard Young's 26-foot cabin cruiser, "The Dons." The tragedy came as they were out-bound on a salmonfishing trip about 9:30 a.m. They the bay for the fog to clear, but finally decided to strike a compass course for the sea.

Tried to Turn Around Paulus told Bosn's Mate Giles Vanderhoof, Coastguardsman, that the bar got progressively rougher as they proceeded and they elected to turn around. As they turned, however, a huge swell threatened to toss their craft onto the south jetty so they swung back seaward. The next swell ripped off the entire pilot house. Railroad Trainmen announced that below to get life jackets when still another one hit us," Paulus was quoted as saying. The next he knew, Paulus was in the ocean clinging to a seat cushion, being tossed end over end, finally touching sand only to be thrown seaward again, and eventually being tossed high enough so he could crawl ashore. First word of the tragedy came when Paulus, calling weakly, attracted the attention of two men a few hundred feet away. Coastguardsmen, answering an emergency call, arrived just as "The Dons" was tossing right-side-up through the fog toward the beach crawled.

A line was put aboard the craft and it was beached, about a halfmile south of the south jetty. In the meantime, other coastguardsmen had found Young and were making unsuccessful attempts to nila envelope, bearing the frank not on "The Dons."
