

Animals and People Isolated by Flood at Grand Island Area, North of Salem

Grand Island in the Willamette River north of Salem was isolated and its fertile shores well flooded Tuesday. Only transportation for the island's several-score families was by boat. Mail, milk cans and groceries are shown being loaded for the isolated residents by neighbors, J. H. Tompkins Jr. (left), Mr. and Mrs. L. T. Pomeroy and Curtis Douglas (in rear).

No one could tell Tuesday how long this bunny had been marooned on this stump at Grand Island but it looked so wet, cold and hungry that a passing boatman, who couldn't get any nearer because of swift water, put a merciful shot through its head.

Rains Close High School At Silverton

Statesman News Service
SILVERTON—"It's an ill wind that blows nobody good." High school students at Silverton Tuesday certainly believed in the old saying. Arrangements had been made to dismiss a few of the classes to view the inaugural ceremonies by television. There were many more students who wanted to be in on it, but could not be dismissed—so they were told Monday. But Monday night and Tuesday morning the rains came and for the first time in three years, flooded the high school basement, making use of the school lavatories impossible. School was dismissed and all television places in town were more than crowded. In past years, considerable difficulty with the flooding of the basement was had but new drains were installed and no trouble was anticipated this winter. The excessive rains, however, presented the old problem again. Even the new drain was not able to take care of all the water that came down Tuesday morning. Water stood in the lunch rooms, the girls lavatory, and lockers were inaccessible excepting through a stream of water. Howard Balderstone, superintendent of schools, said Tuesday afternoon that he could not say whether classes could meet Wednesday or not in high school. "If we can possibly go ahead we will but we do not know how rapidly the water will drain and we do
