Rocks Found at Morningside School Site

What happens when excavation for a new building digs up a pile of gigantic boulders where it was thought there was only dirt? This problem is now faced by Salem District school board at the site of the new Morningside grade school in South Salem.

Many of the boulders have been measured at 12-feet thick. The nine-classroom school is to be located at 12th Street and Strong Road on the crest of the South 12th Street hill. Architect for the structure is William I. Williams.

Currently on the job is Salem Sand and Gravel Company which has been contracted to do the excavation preparatory to construction. Officials of the company report that the boulders may actually prove beneficial in that they may be used to aid in filling a low section on one side of the site which is slated to be a parking lot. Many other tons of the rock are being hauled to a Candelaria school site for fill purposes.

The Salem school board was informed this week by the gravel company that an early bid of $2,954 for grading of 50-feet of right of way on the Morningside site, made at the beginning of excavation, would still stand despite the boulders. "Actually, we'll be able to use a lot of them in the operation," they report.

Delay in progress of the construction because of the boulders was at first believed to be at least two weeks, but it is now thought that there will be little, if any, delay. The school is scheduled to be completed Aug. 26 and to open for use in September.

School officials report that similar problems of unexpected boulders have been uncovered at the South Salem High School, but not quite as bad as at Morningside.

Buying of Bonds Curbs Inflation, Thompson Says

Purchase of U.S. defense and savings bonds by the public rather than by banks has prevented considerably greater inflation, Salem Exchange Club was told Wednesday.

Elton H. Thompson, Salem, a vice president of U.S. National Bank of Portland, said that individual purchases take money out of circulation, while bank buying would add to the "money" supply.

The banker pointed out that 108 billion dollars' worth of these bonds have been sold in the U.S., and that 43 million persons now own bonds. Forty-one billion dollars' worth have been sold since World War II ended. He noted also that all of the sales have been made without a commission being paid to anyone and with most of the work done by volunteers.

Meet to Discuss Central Salem Rezoning Plans

Rezoning of downtown and central Salem will be up for public discussion at a 7:30 p.m. hearing tonight before a committee of Salem Planning and Zoning Commission at City Hall.

This will be fifth and last in a series of neighborhood meetings to hear citizen's views on the proposed new city zoning code.

The revision committee has been meeting weekly to go over the public expressions made at these hearings. Later committee-men will revise the tentative zone map, pass it on to the full commission for formal hearing and then introduction before the City Council.

Court Backs 1951 Factory Inspection Act

Several Oregon industrial firms lost a round to the State Industrial Accident Commission Wednesday in the denial of an injunction against the 1951 factory inspection law.

Circuit Judge Rex Kimmel of Marion County issued a declaratory judgment dismissing the complaint of M&M Woodworking Co., of Portland and other cities, and 12 other firms, largely in the lumber business.

The companies had attacked the provision that the SIAC could waive payment of factory inspection fees for an employer subject to the Workmen's Compensation Act, "if there is a comparable inspection and payment therefor at least equal to such fees."

The plaintiffs, who were not contributors to the accident fund, by choice, contend that the provision gave SIAC legislative powers and was discriminatory against them in such classification, hence unconstitutional.

Judge Kimmel ruled that the plaintiffs' constitutional rights were not affected by the law, upheld the employer classifications which it set up and held that the commission has no power to waive fees for firms not contributing to the accident fund.

Second Navy 'Cruise' To Start at Airport
