WU Unaffected By ROTC Bond Controversies

Willamette University is unaffected by the threatened withdrawal of ROTC units from the two state schools, Mark Hatfield, dean of students, said Thursday.

The University, a private school, provided its own bond for its Air Force ROTC unit, he said.

The threat was posed to Oregon State and the University of Oregon when it was discovered that the state had not put up a bond to protect Federal equipment used to train the college men, as the army requires.

Some state officials had questioned Oregon's right to pay state tax money to a private bonding company. The estimated cost of the bond is $3,500.

However, state officials said they would not let the ROTC units be withdrawn from the two schools on a technicality, and it was generally thought that the state emergency board, which meets today, would allot the money to insure the program's continued operation.

Warning Given On Child Labor Regulations

The uncertainty of fall school openings due to unseasonable crop harvesting Thursday brought a reminder of child labor regulations as they affect Oregon farmers from State Labor Commissioner W. E. Kimsey.

Kimsey said that under the Federal Child Labor Law it is illegal for any farmer to employ a child under the age of 16 years other than his own children during school hours. When schools are not in session there is no restriction on the employment of minors in agriculture except in those cases where minors are to be employed on processing machines such as portable or stationary hop picking devices, in prune dryers and the like.

Work permits obtained from the labor department are necessary for these jobs and to work on them a minor must be at least 16.

Farmers are responsible for every under-age child working on their farms, Kimsey said. He pointed out that any doubt about a child's true age can be cleared by applying for a work permit from the state labor department.

A farmer found to be willfully employing a minor illegally is subject to a $10,000 fine.

Columbia Basin Compact Presents Complex Problems

Frederick L. Zimmerman of New York, research director for the New York Joint Legislative Committee on Interstate Cooperation and an authority on interstate compacts, told the Oregon members of the Columbia Basin Compact Commission Thursday that the compact method for interstate cooperation was a very strong instrument, and at the same time a very flexible instrument.

The Columbia basin however presented problems of great complexity. The difficulty, he said, is over its political feasibility—getting the states to agree on terms of a compact.

The Oregon group, acting on the suggestion of Gov. Paul Patterson, who sat in on the meeting in the Board of Control room, decided to urge the regional commission at its meeting in Yakima on Sept. 11 to have a draft of a compact prepared by experienced persons, as a preliminary proposal, and to inquire if the regional group will not do so if it would object to Oregon's proceeding alone.

Great Confusion
The feeling of Oregon members was that there was great confusion and little cohesion in the past work of the commission, and

Contract Let For Salem's Fair Banners

The Allied Arts company of Portland has been awarded the contract for providing and erecting Salem's 95 "State Fair" banners, Clay Cochran, manager of the Chamber of Commerce said Thursday.

The banners will be hung across city and suburban streets, Aug. 26, he said.

The company has handled fair-time banners for Salem the past two years. Large-size, colorful banners will be hung over the five main entrances to the city. Others will decorate main districts of the city and fringe areas.

Cost of the project was not given, but the estimated cost is about $1,600.
