Turkey Talk—Buying

Birds for All Occasions, Sized Families Available at Markets

By MAXINE BURFN
Statesman Women's Editor

This is the second of a series of six stories on turkey and the Thanksgiving dinner, which will appear on Wednesdays and Saturdays until the Big Day. Clip them, you'll get the complete Thanksgiving picture. Next article Wednesday, Nov. 18 on "Extras."

The housewife of today finds variety on styles of turkey to suit every taste and every occasion. Beginning with the small Beltsville type, weighing from 4 to 10 pounds, she'll find very large ones, up to 25 pounds in most markets. There will be frozen and sometimes smoked turkeys, too. Modern methods of feeding insure tender turkeys at just about any size.

WATCH BARGAINS
In buying turkey, you'll usually pay top price for the highest quality. Sometimes, though of course not always, bargains are marked down for a reason. True, these reasons often may not be such that they make the fowl any less desirable for your use. For instance, sometimes a turkey is marked down because of a slightly deformed breast bone which does not spoil its flavor. But sometimes bargain turkeys have other less desirable qualities—they have been roughly handled, bruised or skin broken. Just check when you see a turkey priced away out of line from the standard.

Remember too in checking the price, that some markets quote prices dressed and drawn weight, some are weighed with head and feet on and not drawn, while some other prices are quoted "on the hoof." If buying according to the latter two systems, be sure you know how much the unuseable parts should weigh so you can tell whether you are getting a good buy.

ABOUT THE SIZE

Judge the size of the bird by the number of servings you want. Buy one-half pound ready-to-cook turkey for each serving you want to get from it. Quality of turkey, method of cooking and skill of carver of course varies the rule.

Here are some pointers on the types of turkeys found in the markets:
Ready-to-cook means eviscerated, drawn, cleaned and ready for cooking. It may be fresh or frozen, giblets are usually placed in the neck cavity. If frozen, at least partially thaw before cooking.

Dressed (formerly New York dressed) means that bird is weighed after feathers are removed but before drawn and with head and feet on. Your retailer will get it ready for cooking, removing head and feet, leg tendons. He will complete the dressing.

Cut up—A half turkey split lengthwise, a quarter turkey or individual pieces like all dark meat, all breasts, back and wings, giblets.
