Test Seen for State's Place In Seed World

By LILLIE L. MADSEN
Farm Editor, The Statesman
CORVALLIS — Oregon's true place in the seed world may have an opportunity to be tested out this coming year, Rex Warren, crop specialist, said recently. Warren, one-time assistant at Alderman Farms near Dayton, is now crop specialist at the college, making a specialty of studying seed crops.

Since prices of most of the field seeds have declined during the past two years, Oregon's position as an important producer of these seeds, becomes more clear, Warren continued.

The removal of price support along with the decline in prices likely will tend to eliminate areas that are not as ideally suited to seed production as are Oregon, Washington and Idaho.

Gives Reasons
Warren pointed out some of the reasons why Oregon has produced seeds and why it will likely continue to produce seeds. Among these he listed dry summers and mild winters as conducive to good seed growth. The dry summers result in fine harvesting conditions, high yields and good quality seed. The mild winters also aid in high yields.

In recent years, high prices brought many less favored areas in the United States into seed production. These areas are lost as competitors when prices drop as their yields are not sufficiently high to make seed growing economical at the lower prices.

Low Prices
The recent low prices already have forced Alta fescue out of production in some marginal areas. The trend is expected to continue, which would put good growers in Oregon in a favored position.

However, Harold Fennell, seed certification specialist, warned that only high quality seed will be in demand. Growers have become quality conscious through recent competition, Fennell said. They are now planting seed of poor germination in addition to noticeable quantities of obnoxious weed seed content. Farmers not situated to produce high quality seed should step out of the business, the seed specialist warned.

AFL Requests World Council On Economics

MIAMI BEACH, Fla.—The AFL Executive Council Sunday urged holding an international economic conference to promote trade and living standards in the Free World and recommended a tight boycott on products made by forced labor.

These were two highlights in a foreign policy statement approved by the AFL council at its winter meeting here and released Sunday.

In another action the council called on Congress to enact legislation giving pay raises to postal workers and other government employees.

The foreign policy resolution proposed an economic conference of "all non-totalitarian countries" to plan mutual assistance in building up trade, developing productive capacities and purchasing power, stabilizing prices of basic raw materials and making more efficient use of natural resources and manpower.

The council mentioned gold, coal, lumber, oil and chrome as among products produced by slave labor, principally behind Russia's Iron Curtain, and said such production is undermining "decent standards of work and pay in the Free World."

To meet this threat the council urged the government to promote a boycott among free nations "in banning the sale and distribution in their markets of all commodities in whole or in part by forced labor." A permanent subcommittee of the United Nations General Assembly to expose slave labor conditions also was recommended.

The council said that since Madenkov succeeded Stalin as head of the Soviet regime "the post-Stalin dictatorship has not made the slightest break or retreat from its basic aims" of world conquest.

The AFL group called for negotiations among democratic allies on pooling atomic energy resources in advance of any talks with Russia on the world atom peace pool as proposed by President Eisenhower.
