When you meet the horizontal sea you must stand in awe. In the focal point you make of yourself, it extends to the right and left, and as it spreads out it lengthens the breadth of you, and the amazing paradox, it deepens you.

So it has been with the ocean since the beginning of time in the unending horizontal of its being. Just as the first fin heading from fresh water into its depths carried a congregation that would make it dense with life, so has man, since his beginnings, stretched himself in its depths to multiply his subconscious realm.

By sight only: thoughts, emotions deepen into a distance stare that draws him forward, seeing nothing but being aware of some dark liquid visage looking back at him, inhuman, yet human like a distant ship at night sparkling with a light that shines over dark waters.

The unfathomable horizontal, grinding the rocky aggregates into an eternal contemporary lode in its elusive presence where man stands watch. The great sea unity into which all the cosmic stresses crush an impalpable space with the taste of salt.

By day the eyes devour and the ears hear only what the eyes will see. But the night: the eyes turn inward where the taste of salt is strong on the mind. On the landward wind of evening the human touch draws close to self, watching a fireplace ember away, undampened by the salt sea.

The rooms sit listening to the articulate surf mass running the rising tides of night. The consciousness-unconscious human tides blend with the room contained sea: in the wooden rectangles lost in their sense of building direction, clattering upon the headlands like stumped non-entities alone exist. Squares of light flared, building up in the dark, haphazard levels that fall and scatter at the breaking tide of day.
