New Zealand Has Too Many Calves, People

By LILLIE L. MADSEN
Farm Editor, The Statesman
SILVERTON — There are as many dairy calves as people in New Zealand, and too many of each, John Whitehead of Kiarua, North Palmerston, New Zealand, quipped Sunday at the Marion County Livestock Association picnic.

The picnic, an annual summer event for the association, was held at the Coolidge & McClaine Park at Silverton, with some 200 members and guests in attendance. There are 35 million sheep in New Zealand, which is the size of Oregon—and that means there are as many sheep in that small area as there are in all of the United States, Whitehead continued. He is on the International Farm Exchange and spending about 10 days at the Howard Egman home, Silverton.

Here For Study
He explained that he came to the United States to study dairy methods, but believed that New Zealand had as much to give as to learn. Eighty-five per cent of the dairy cows in New Zealand are Jerseys, Whitehead said, adding that he had never seen a Guernsey until he came to the United States. Romney sheep predominated although there were a number of other breeds as well, he said.

New Zealand is large in agriculture, the visitor continued, as he told that 98 per cent of the exports are farm products. In fact, he said, New Zealand is the largest exporter of farm products in the world.

Farming Successful
Farming, he went on, has been very successful there, due largely to three things: Pasture research, mechanization and refrigeration. Pasture research has made it possible to produce livestock and livestock products much more cheaply than in this country, he believed. But, he said, could sell there now at 25 cents a pound, and there was little or no competition from butter substitutes. Everything was mechanized, the New Zealander said of his home country. Refrigeration made it possible to ship farm produce safely to other countries. Great Britain is the largest recipient of New Zealand products, he said.

Henry Ahrens, Turner, president of the association, opened the brief business meeting and program which followed the picnic dinner, and then turned it over to Ben A. Newell, who served as master of ceremonies.

Tells of Plans
Walter Holt, manager of the Pacific International Livestock Association, told of plans for that big show this fall, which will be back in its old buildings, following a year's showing in tents when the army occupied the buildings.

Holt also announced that a large number of Marion County folk were serving in key positions at the show, adding "that without Marion County assistants, we'd have to close the show this year." Newell, Holt said, will be the superintendent of dairy at the P.I. Others will be announced this week.

MAIL BOX RAIDED
A complaint of vandalism of mail at the residence of David H. Ellstrom, 2480 N. 4th St., was made to police Sunday. Children were reported to have strewn mail about the premises while the Ellstroms were absent. All of the mail was apparently recovered.
