Unions Oppose TV Shooting Overseas

By EVE STARR

Hollywood — TELETRIAL — "RUNAWAY" PRODUCTIONS: Would you cross the street to buy the same car for two-thirds its usual price? Should the dealer on this side be able to successfully sue you for the act? This seems to be the argument at stake in the brewing battle between unions and movie and TV producers who save by shooting their films abroad.

There are many films and telefilms made over yonder purely for foreign flavor and locale called for by the script, but there's no doubt in anyone's mind that many others are made in Italy, France and Mexico because of cheaper labor and production costs. Such savings in England are far less drastic so economy is not a real attraction to producers from over here.

Well, some fur is going to fly, and movieland and TV-land will probably join forces to combat the rising tide of opposition to U. S. productions abroad, and producers who can't show more than a money saving reason for moving their cameras across the Atlantic or the Rio Grande may be in for a rough time. And yet, are any of them guilty? Guilty of what? Guilty of manufacturing something the most economical way they know how? Isn't that the American system itself? Isn't the wisest American business the one which makes its products by the cheapest method that still leaves quality up to par?

We're personally all for protecting American workmen and trade against cheap imports from slave labor and the like. But this is something entirely different. Labor and production costs for motion pictures have skyrocketed and are still on the way up, cramping many a producer and forcing others right out of business. Can you blame them if they try to stay in business or show a better profit by hiring less costly help under cheaper operating conditions? Isn't it just possible that the fault lies right here in the old USA? Perhaps labor and production mediums should trim their sails to meet this opposition which is actually competition, which is claimed to be the life itself of our great American way. If it isn't met and if our producers are forced to pay domestic rates down the line, then you and we, as usual will eventually make up the difference in higher prices for products.

Eugene Catholics Eye School Funds

EUGENE (AP) — A campaign is in progress to raise $240,000 for construction of two new Catholic grade schools and an eight-room addition to St. Francis High School here.

The Rev. Edmund J. Murnane, pastor of St. Mary's Parish, said the new facilities are needed to relieve overcrowding in existing schools.
