NEW YORK (INS) - Dame she's going out a pert, potential

At all times during the year, she has been decorous and elegant. Never has she allowed her neckline to dip too low, or her hem-line too rise to high. Though her figure has been artfully outlined in dresses, she has never been snugly or "sexily" clad.

Always, fashion of '54 has been lady-like.

The year started out in January and February with the news Beverly Bell that an "easier, casual" look would replace the more form-fitting silhouette of 1953. The cinch belt had disappeared, and in its place were very narrow belts or none at all. The waist, as a focal point, "went out."

Hems Up tention. Hemlines were noticeably shorter than they had been in Jan-uary of 1953, but they never rose higher than about 16 inches from the floor - never came close to revealing a not - very - attractive Tweeds began to become the chief fashion fabric of the season, and the designers were promoting shades of red and purple as good basic colors to replace the all-time favorite, black.

As spring began to come on, the "shape" became the thing. High-fashion designers showed dresses and suits almost completely lined with Pellon, the interlining felt-like material that made hiplines bell out and waistlines curve in delicately. Skirts generally were slim, but easy to walk in rather than hobble-type as they had been in seasons past.

Coats were taking a trend toward the shorter. Three-quarter, seven-eighths and short-short (waist-length) wraps were begin-ning to return to fashion for spring and summer.

Jackets Brief

Suit jackets, too, were becoming more brief. Some peplums on jackets barely covered the hip-bone. A few styles, hinting of the flapper look to come, were unfitted at the waist and pulled in at the hip-middy fashion.

With the coming of summer, there was the natural switch to fuller skirts, gayer colors, lower scooped necklines and less consistency in fashion trends. In the warm weather anything goes, just

Then came fall-and the more radical changes. Christian Dior, the Paris designer who seems to have a corner on the bossing of style switches, came out with his "H-line." I was a new shaping of the female torso-a longer, slimmer line with a raised and slightly flattened

Immediately the "H-line" caught en, under heavy promotion from the American and European fashon press. And the long, moulded ook that resulted is the height of style today.

Back Again

In a lady-like way, the new styles are verging on the Flapper ara models. Belts are often found around the upper hipline. Waist lines are, in some cases, lost altogether under loose middy jackets. Bosoms are as delicate as Nature will allow.

Heels are spikier than ever Beads are dangling and clinking in long ropes. Hair is swept back short. There are even a few spit curls poking out on the cheeks of adies who take their fashion rends most seriously.
