Little America Usefulness Lost To Shifting Ice

WASHINGTON - Dispatches from the Navy icebreaker Atka Tuesday reported that shifting ice has destroyed the usefulness of Little America as a base for future operations in the Antarctic.

Little America was the polar home of Rear Adm. Richard Byrd the 1930's. It was also used by later expeditions.

When the Atka arrived there, the dispatches said, its crew found that sections of the ice cap had collapsed and that geographical features which made Little America a comparatively sheltered area had disappeared.

The Atka's dispatches were dated Jan. 15 and 17. They said that parts of the camp and equipment left by the Byrd expeditions and others were still intact but that shifts in the polar icecap had destroyed much of the ice-locked Bay of Whales.
