McKay Says Power Policy 'Positive' Way

WASHINGTON (UP) - Interior Secretary Douglas McKay, stressing the importance of federal, local and private cooperation, said Tuesday the Eisenhower administration has taken the "positive approach" in developing electric power. Obviously referring to the advocates of public power McKay said the new program is "a departure from the negative view that only the federal government is equipped to do the job..." "The construction to be undertaken is too tremendous and costly for the federal government to carry the burden alone," McKay said in his annual report to President Eisenhower for the fiscal year ended last June 30. Under the new policy, McKay said local interests and private industry are encouraged to play their proper part. Many hydro-electric projects proposed for development, he said, involve partnerships with private firms or local public agencies constructing the power facilities and the government financing the non-reimbursable features of the project. Under the new power program, McKay said the government "will undertake large multi-purpose projects which are beyond the means of local, public or private enterprise." McKay's report did not mention the controversial Dixon-Yates contract which would allow a private utility to transmit power into the government owned Tennessee Valley Authority system. McKay said reclamation and power facilities provided in the current fiscal year's construction program will add 290,000 acres of irrigable land and increase hydro-generating capacity by 241,500 kilowatts. But he added that nearly five million acres of irrigated land could be added to the agricultural potentiality of Western states and nearly 700,000 kilowatts of hydro-electric generating capacity could be installed in projects already authorized by Congress.
