Continental Swank for Small Fry

(AP News Features)
There's nothing that pleases small fry as much as having clothes just like Dad's — or Mom's.
Newest contribution to this type of juvenile joy is an authentic trench coat, made in Germany, complete with shoulder epaulets, yoke back, stitched belt, high turn-up collar, deep pockets and plaid lining. Boys and girls feel as dramatic as their favorite TV sleuth when wearing this dashing garment, which also is water-repellent, wind-resistant and washable.

The same styles are made for all the family—Mom and Pop as well as Sis and Junior—and they're selling like hot-cakes in the United States.
It's a strange thing, and one on which clothing manufacturers might ponder, that fads may come and fads may go, but there are a few classic styles that go on forever.

One is the camel's hair polo coat, as popular today as it was 20 years ago. Another is the middy and skirt, which returns periodically to fashion favor—as for instance right now.
The plain one-piece wool-knit bathing suit is another item which always comes back.
And then there's the oilskin slicker, which never has gone out of style since the flapper era, and is one of the best-selling garments in the juvenile wardrobe today.

The reason must be that all these things are functional, make sense, have no unnecessary frills or furbelows and don't cost too much.
The same is true of the trench coat, which was born during World War I and has been going strong ever since, with a big boost during World War II and now added impetus from current TV foreign correspondent thrillers.
