County Shovel Clears Dirt

A Marion County shovel was called upon Wednesday to clear dirt which had fallen on South River Road south of the golf course.

Marion County Commissioner Roy Rice told the county court that slippage of the embankment had probably been caused by recent heavy rains.

Court members were also told that a section of Garden Road, east of Salem, may have to be "roughed up" because it is too slick. Several accidents have occurred on the short hill, according to Commissioner E. L. Rogers.

Warne Nunn, who now heads Marion County's Red Cross blood program.

Nunn to Lead Red Cross Blood Project

—with cut—Chairman (125) ... Warne Nunn, Salem, has been named chairman of Marion County's Red Cross blood program, replacing Dr. Henry Morris who headed the program for two years.

Nunn is State Public Utilities Commissioner. A graduate of Willamette University, he served in the Army Air Force. He was employed by the Civil Service Commission until his appointment to the PUC position three years ago.

Nunn plans to reshuffle the county's recruitment and scheduling of donors. A county-wide committee to assist with visits of the bloodmobile in cities outside of Salem is also in the offing.

West Slope Sewage Plan Being Studied

A sewage disposal plan to take care of the troublesome west slope area above South River Road is under long-range consideration by the city engineering department.

The plan, estimated to cost some $102,000, could service up to 4,000 persons on the west side of Fairmount Hill, Candalaria Heights, Laurel Springs addition and the Croisan Creek drainage area, City Engineer J. Harold Davis reports.

The new plan would provide a gravity line along Croisan Creek from the Salem Golf Course to the foot of Mission Street, a 50-foot lift station and a gravity line along Mission to connect with the Church Street interceptor.

It would substitute for a previous plan to install a small primary treatment plant near the golf course which met opposition recently from the State Sanitary Authority. Authority engineers advised the city that if a primary plant were installed it would require the effluent to be piped to the Willamette River, a distance of some 4,500 feet, running the cost of that plan to $75,000. It, however, would serve only a limited area.

Cost of a complete treatment plant which would be necessary in order to dump the effluent into Croisan Creek would be prohibitive, Davis indicated.

If the line-lift system is installed it would permit development of a large area of the west slope now faced with a critical sewage problem, Davis said. Several homes inside the city in the Fir-Bush Street pocket are at present on septic tanks.

State Highway Engineer Wins Traffic Award

F. Bruce Crandall, the state highway department's traffic engineer, won the top award in the 1954 nationwide traffic engineering competition sponsored by the Association of Casualty and Surety companies.

Crandall's award came for a simple and inexpensive method of channeling traffic at an irregular four-street intersection in Oregon City. The plan reduced accidents 47 per cent during a 17-month period after it became effective.

He received a $100 check from the sponsoring organization at a special testimonial luncheon in Portland Wednesday.

Crandall solved the accident problem at the intersection by installing a long, curved concrete "jiggle bar" on one of the streets, forcing drivers to follow a course which gave them better visibility and eliminated shortcutting left-hand turns.

The installation cost about $175.

Regulation of Junk Dealers, Auctioneers Gains

Junk dealers and auctioneers would be supervised by county courts and the state under two bills approved by the House Wednesday and sent to the Senate.

Both measures were urged by the Oregon Sheriffs Association. One would have counties license secondhand equipment and junk dealers and auctioneers. The other would set up a state board of auctioneers.

Auctioneers would be bonded and pay license fees up to $150 each.

The legislation would apply only to dealers and auctioneers outside of cities.
