

A Package of Mix Can Soar to Great Heights in Extra Fancy Party Food

By MAXINE BUREN
Statesman Woman's Editor

Recently we wrote a story lauding packaged gingerbread mix, which we now find, cannot come up to the versatility of a package of that light, delicate and supposedly temperamental cake—angel.

Remember when you couldn't walk heavily across the floor when angel cake was in the oven? Well, it's not so these days, we put them in and take them out, we cut them in half, add fillings and toppings, we pop the batter into muffin tins and may even into the waffle iron, though I haven't tried that one yet.

These ready mixed, easy-to-handle packaged angel food cakes may, you think, be what grandma would have been proud of, but we'll venture to bet that there's many a one at the cooking contests that at least was a runner-up.

FANCY TRICKS

One of the things to do with an angel cake is to bake the batter as usual in a 10-inch pan then cut it across in 5 layers. Spread each with a different color of jam or jelly, pile 'em up and top with whipped cream. Suggestions are raspberry jam, apricot jam, currant jelly, and some mint for color variety.

Somebody used coffee in the place of the water designated in the recipe, and produced a feathery light cake with distinct coffee flavor.

And somebody else baked her angel cake in 4 9-inch layer pans for 25 to 30 minutes and when cool spread the layers with this mixture
