

New Facilities Await Users of Salem Parks This Summer

Some of the new features of Salem city parks which will greet outdoor goers this summer are shown on this page in pictures by Statesman staff photographer John Erickson.

Extensive work during the last winter has given many of the parks somewhat of a new appearance and provided more spacious facilities for picnickers.

Picnic tables now total 175 at Bush Pasture and two shelters, one of which is pictured on this page, are ready for use. Each contains 12 electric burners.

Several rose beds near the High Street side of the park have been planted and the Pringle Creek area has been cleaned up for picnickers.

At Englewood, a wading pool will be installed after the first of next month, and already in operation there are a four-burner electric unit and new comfort station.

Picnic tables have been added at Pringle Park and Walter Wirth, superintendent of city parks, states that if all delegations planning to picnic will let his office know their plans, congestion at parks will be avoided. Delegations' plans will be filed and other groups will be told if space is available where they plan to go.
