Cape Cod Sold H. Dies in 1948 White died there in 1948, three On Durable Wood Houses

By A. ROBERT SMITH Statesman Correspondent

CAPE COD, Mass. - In a clearing in the pines here near the town of Falmouth stands a monument before which the American lumber industry might kneel in most reverent appreciation - a wood constructed Cape Cod house nearly 200 years old.

This oldest dwelling on the cape, built entirely of wood (and without benefit of nails) during the colonial days, still stands sturdily on its foundation since the day it was erected by Miss Virtue Gifford's Quaker forebears.

But this is not a restored tourist attraction. It is the house in which Miss Gifford still lives as she has for over 80 years, its cedar shingles still defying time and the eroding character of the sea air.

Unlike the houses that are tirelessly advertised throughout the East as Cape Cod type houses, Miss Gifford's residence is authentic as any could be. It has a mark of authenticity that has died out in contemporary building, even on the cape - a bowed roof that looks like an overturned ship's bottom. Bowed Roof

Capt. John R. Peterson's 20-year old home also has a bowed roof, but later Mrs. Peterson had dormer windows punched into the sloping sides to make the second sloping sides to make the second floor more practical with lighting Vets Reminded and ventilation. When an addition was put onto the original house. Of Education roof with dormer windows something the architect wouldn't hear of two decades ago.

These variations on the Cape Cod house are now commonplace temporary houses, but so few that a daring modern built during of Oregon educational benefits World War I days by architect while a tten ding college, night while a tten ding college, night in a setting of "salt boxes," school classes or business, vocational technical or other according as the simple Cape Cod is often called.

No Lumber Industry But everyone, with scarcely an exception, builds with wood. Even the wealthy. It's not because the cape has a thriving lumber industry, for its scrub pines aren't very productive of building materials. It's just that Cape Codders are sold on the durability of wooden Even the hotels, from the smallest to the largest, are made of wood, most of them covered with cedar shingles. Most were built decades ago and were modernized inside to suit the fancy of changing times. But slick modern conveniences don't seem to count for much here. One hotel owner seems to have standing proof of that. His barnlike inn, painted an unbecoming umber color, has made only two concessions to the 20th century electric lights have been installed, and a measure of inside plumbing has been hooked up for the guests, for the ladies at one end of the hotel and for the gents at the other

The old clapboard hostelry is filled all summer.

Veritable Castles Although the well-to-do are plentiful here among the 200,000 who inhabit Cape Cod for the summer this resort was never in the class with Newport, R.I., or Lenox, Mass., where the rich of a bygon era built veritable castles equipp with gold lined bathtubs and battalions of servants to keep them from tarnishinig. While those castles crumble or give way to commercialized use as hotels, the more modest but still expensive homes of Cape Cod are maintained by their owners from Boston and New York in blissful seclusion.

In some areas of the cape, estate owners have protective associations, employing peace officers to keep rubbernecking tourists from invading the privacy of their summer way of life.

But whether the Cape Cod residence is a $100,000 country estate or a $10,000 salt box, it is still strikingly similar in architectural design, faithful to the Cape Cod tradition to a great extent, and always built of wood.

The amount of $10,000 bills in circulation declined from 60 miltion dollars in 1940 to 9 million dollars in 1955.
