Pitchers on Display at Museum

Pitchers, which anybody can understand, are currently on display at the Bush Museum, being the hollow kind with handles at one end and lip at the other, and designed for containing liquids.
This group, specially put together for the Salem Art museum by Mrs. A. L. Wallace, Mrs. Sidney B. Lewis and Miss Maxine Buren consists of glass, porcelain, stone and earthen-ware vessels of varying ages of antiquity.

While the artisans, who manufactured the pitchers, had certain limitations of function to meet, their imagination in decorating, inventing, distorting and adapting beyond necessary function is apparent. For example, the head of Herbert Hoover looks at you out of one glass case, where it rests on what must be his hands, attached to something in back which the Republican women's organization who con-cocted the idea probably thought would make the President easier

All Types of Pitchers Another eye catching novelty is not something made by a glass blower during a sneeze, but a pitcher designed for sipping when prone, presumably ill. However, its proximity in the dining room case to a rum pot makes one wonder a little whether this modern age is getting faster or slowing down. Antiquity had its moments.

One of its higher moments is represented by the blue decorated English pitchers, an another by a tiny blue Oriental piece. There are also majolica, luster ware, pressed and blown glass and a large brown crockery ewer which makes you give an involun-tary glance at the floor to see if but . . . gazing at the lovely creations out at the cake baking department of State Fair, we wondered how many of the luscious cakes were made with mixes. Who would know? Who would care?

All hands . . . We see by a business opportunity ad that we can retire comfortably on 1/2 acre if we conduct the easy business the ad suggests. So with our present ten acres, we ought to be able to take care of the whole family and a few in-laws.

Out of the nowhere . . . every Fair time we wonder where those people come from, now I suppose they'll crawl back into their holes for another year.

Ha ha ha . . . we often write ourselves notes on what to put in this column. We find one, "Price of fame . . . mar drives to Florence" and if you can figure out what we meant by it, you are funnier than us.

Just minor . . . a lady asking us to make a very minor change (a matter of one word) in a story already to roll on Saturday morning, was unimpressed when told it was a mat-ter of taking an awful lot of time for what the change was worth. Here is what was involved. First we had to locate the story, already in the forms, they had to be unlocked, the type taken out and proof made of it. We read and corrected the proof. Another man had to reset a new line of the type, still another man had to put it in to replace the old line. The type was then put back into the forms which were re-locked. This mistake, by the way, was the lady's. . . Maxine Buren.
