

State Weed Control Meeting Draws 125

By LILLIE L. MADSEN
Farm Editor, The Statesman
The new dial telephones compare to the old "crank" phones just as a nervous highblooded horse compares to an old plow horse, in the opinion of Peter van den Bosch, with the Weed Control Service, Portland.

Bosch, one of the afternoon speakers at the fourth annual Oregon Weed Conference in Salem told of the high cost of brush control along railroad, highways and around industrial plants.

"The new dials can't stand any brush around them or beneath the wires, while frequently the wires for the old telephones were hanging in trees and run through brush," he added.

The conference, with an opening day attendance of more than 125, will close its two-day meet this afternoon at the Senator Hotel, where all sessions are held in the Capitol Room.

Purpose Explained
C. A. Tom, president, opened the Wednesday session, with explaining the purpose of the conference as to "promote and coordinate weed control." Much of the discussion was highly technical, aimed largely for distributors and applicators of chemicals in weed control.

The importance of checking produce for any excess residue of pesticides was explained briefly by Virgil Freed, agricultural chemist at the state college, as he discussed the Miller amendment to the Food and Drug Act. This amendment was passed to put certain tolerances of residue on agricultural materials going into interstate commerce, Freed explained.

Check Urged
"Producers should check in the next few months to see that chemicals they are using have necessary tolerances and are used on the crops correctly," Freed warned. In response to questioning, Freed explained further that the government was not interested in what the farmer used on his crop so long as it does not leave a residue when used on food crops. "The Miller Amendment doesn't want to dictate to the farmers, it merely wants to protect the consumers," he said.

Robert Ohling, Blue Lake Packers, Inc., Salem, representative, said that vegetable crops most commonly produced in the Salem area are not tolerant of 2,4-D, a chemical which has been widely used here. He discussed as "promising" many of the new chemicals now under test, some of which are already being used. Contact sprays, applied before crop emergence from the soil, are now among the most popular methods of control he said.

Labor Costs Cited
All speakers Wednesday brought out that the increase in use of chemicals in weed control is necessitated by the high cost of hand labor, formerly used to eradicate weeds.

Other Wednesday speakers included W. R. Furtick, Dave Chilcote, Roland Laning, with Palmer Ford moderating a panel, on which Jake Neufeldt, Harold Schieferstein, Judge Rex Hartley and E. M. Nelson spoke.

The session will open this morning at 9:30 with the annual business meeting slated for 2 p.m.

Posts Open in State Agency

The State Civil Service Commission announced Wednesday it is accepting applications for positions in the State Agricultural Department.

Qualifications for meat inspection analyst call for one year of responsible experience in a federal or state agricultural program and college graduation.

High level experience in the meat industry, involving statistical analysis or reporting, or experience involving the development of informational material for publication may be substituted for the above requirement on a year for year basis. The salary range is $400 to $500 a month.

Candidates for agricultural inspector 1 should have two years of experience within the past 10 years in the production, pasteurization or inspection of fluid milk products and be a high school graduate.

College graduation with major work in dairy husbandry or manufacturing may be substituted for the required experience. The salary range is $295 to $380 a month.

There is no written civil service test for these classifications. Candidates will be scored on the basis of their experience and an oral interview.
