Conservation is the WISE USE of our natural resources

FOR IRRIGATION
FOR PAYROLLS
FOR FISHLIFE
FOR BETTER LIVING

Raindrops and melting snow = the magic of falling water
The magic of falling water = Oregon's greatest natural resource

How do you make the wisest use of it?
Small streams flow into rivers, and rivers flow into bigger rivers, and the big rivers flow into the sea. It is not conservation to let them run free and useless, deep in the bottom of canyons or flat on the flood plains along the lower stretches.

If we don't use this water in many ways much of its usefulness is wasted. And waste is not wisdom.

If we use a river only for irrigation, it is a resource used only in the development of our agricultural economy.

If we use the river only for the preservation of fish, our agricultural economy suffers, and literally millions of kilowatts of electric energy flow unharvested into the sea.

And if we use the river for power alone—without regard for the farms or for the fish—we are then, too, being wasteful and unwise.

Wise Use means utilizing all of the potential benefits of a stream, to bring the greatest good to the greatest possible number of people!

Oregon Needs to Use the Deschutes River for Irrigation, for Fishlife, for Recreation, and for Electric Power

There are few streams in the United States that can make a better example of the multiple usage of a major resource than can Oregon's Deschutes river.

In its headwaters it is used for sports fishing, recreation and irrigation. In the irrigation process, lakes have been created which provide game fishing for thousands of people.

Yes, the Deschutes is a fishing stream. It also has been recognized as a power stream for many, many years... certain federal lands bordering it were set aside for power purposes by Executive Order authorized by an Act of Congress back in 1910.

We Can Have Both Power Poles and Fishing Poles

The completion of Pelton dam on the Deschutes river will mean the creation of an entirely new recreational spot for Oregonians... available to thousands, while the present, almost inaccessible stretch of the river is enjoyed by only a few. To enhance the enjoyment of boat fishermen and recreationists, PGE will, in building the project, provide an access road into the reservoir area, with boat dock, trailer ramp and picnic grounds. Besides, 100 miles of swift fishing water will remain undisturbed between the project and the mouth of the Deschutes.

The natural flow of the river will be preserved by means of a re-regulating dam about three miles downstream from Pelton. For the passage of migrating fish there will be a fish ladder which bypasses both dams. This ladder will have gradients comparable to or less steep than the successful ladders at other hydroelectric projects in the Columbia basin. Altogether, the fish facilities will represent about $5,000,000 of the estimated $25,000,000 cost of the project.

Irrigation, recreation, fishlife, power; isn't this, then, wise use?
