Americans Making Wide Use Of Constitutional Privilege to Seek Redress for Grievances

By ARTHUR EDSON
 AP Newsfeatures Writer

WASHINGTON (AP)—The people have a right, the constitution says, to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

And almost every day Congress is in session, a surprisingly large batch of petitions arrives, listing grievances somebody wants redress promptly.

The latest delivery probably is typical.

Members of the Massachusetts House of Representatives leads off, angrily declaring that dirty work has been done to John Adams and his boy, John Quincy, the only father-son combination ever to become U. S. presidents.

The grievance: No longer do the faces of John and John Q. appear on the two and six-cent postage stamps respectively.
