Early West Flavor Carefully Retained By Famous Resort

(Editor's Note Statesman Farm and Garden editor Lillie Madsen is on a tour to the Midwest states. This is the second in a series of articles she will send on the farm and vacation conditions in the areas she visits.)

By LILLIE L. MADSEN

JACKSON, Wyo., — Zane Grey and Eli Couler and their Westerns could have been dug right out of this place. Nothing could be more western than Jackson.

Not that it is garishly so. On the contrary, being western is real here; quiet, dignified, but western to the core. Likely the founders knew at a glance and any building they would erect wouldn't have a snow in the shadow of the Grand Teton. The buildings are mostly small and of natural log or stone, so they fit in, rather than stand out from the picturesque "hole."

Even the big new Jackson Lake Lodge has been planned to harmonize with the unspoiled beauty of the countryside. The 60-foot picture window in the main lounge of the lodge frames Jackson Lake and the 12,584-foot Mount Moran. The building stands on a wooded knoll facing the Grand Teton Range, and while its interior is as modern as Los Angeles's Beverly Hilton, its prices to guests are very moderate, ranging from $8 to $14 depending upon accommodations — whether double or singles.

While there has been, for some years, a Jackson Lake Lodge, this new one was built a year ago at a cost of around $5 million. Although we had planned to stay there, it was closed the day we arrived and instead we are put up at the attractive and interesting Jackson Hole Lodge in Jackson itself. All accommodations in the Grand Teton National Park are closed for the season.

Old Chinese Red Leader Comes Back

By LEONARD LEFKOW

HONG KONG, Sept. 23 (AP) — Li-san, the in-and-out man of the Chinese Communist party, emerged tonight from two years of obscurity. He is back in—but not solid.

The 60-year-old onetime leader of the Red revolution who fled to Russia in 1929 to escape the wrath of his Chinese comrades, delivered a long, self-abasing speech to the eighth party congress.

Peiping radio quoted Li as telling the delegates: "I dare not venture to say that the root of my mistakes has been got rid of completely nor... that I shall be free from mistakes from now on."

"If I do not help my vigilance, be modest and discreet... if I do not thoroughly rid myself of cocksureness, conceit and self-complacency and if I do not receive constant supervision from the party it is very likely I shall make mistakes again..."

"I hope that from now on you, comrades, will all the time supervise my work and give me greater help."

During the late 20s Li led a strong faction in the Red Chinese party that advocated armed revolt by the workers. Mao Tse-tung, the present ruler, favored revolution by the farmers. Mao won and Li left. He returned to China about 1945 with a Russian wife. He was taken back into the good graces of the party and went to the top.

But in a few years he again fell into "hot water," this time for "blind leadership." He apparently purged himself but not well enough to climb back to the top. Peiping radio said Li was "now deputy director of the Industrial Communications Work Department" of the party's Central Committee, a sharp comedown from his past high posts—minister of labor and member of the ruling Politburo. Today's broadcast said he is a member of the 44-man Central Committee of the party.

NEW LAW ATTACKED

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 23 (AP) — Tourist guides in Mexico City are fighting a law requiring their cars to be painted yellow like taxis and hired cars. They say their customers make trips outside the capital and prefer vehicles that look like private cars. Cars painted like taxis would identify them immediately as tourists — something no tourist likes, the guides say.

son. Jackson rubs shoulders with the park where fishing is now unusually good, so it is a busy little city, and places to stay are at a premium.

The town is much quieter than one would anticipate after having read that it was one of the hideouts of many of the outlaws of the wild west of the 1880's and 1890's. There is none of the Yippy 'Y' Ya one associates with that which the term "western" usually covers. Gambling was outlawed a short while back. While there are bars and cocktail lounges, they are maintained strictly within the law which also holds to absolute Sunday closing. Clothing is colorful, and while all types are seen if you stay here a few days, most of that worn is of the better Western, sweaters, tweeds and flannels.

Changing Population

It is a changing population. The "homers" number about 1,300, but that number is tripped each day in the "comes and goes." Jackson has 800 hotel units which will accommodate 2,400 people, besides guest ranches, hotels, rooms in private homes which will care for another 1,600.

At Jack Moore's Open Range — as fine a restaurant as one will find anywhere, so far as food is concerned, this week diners casually rubbed elbows and exchanged greetings with Tom Kelly, who received an academy award nomination for his portrayal in the film "Caine Mutiny," and now has his own television show in San Francisco. Kelly is here for some fishing. And there's Stuart Jewell, director of photography for Disney, Inc., here shooting activities in the park and on ranches. He also shot a sequence of mountain climbing, he tells, which took him to the top of Grand Teton. He said the climbing sequence will be the highlight of a new film, and added that this was the most interesting and difficult assignment he has ever undertaken. He is staying here, awaiting the fall color at peak.

Ospens Are Golden

To us the color couldn't be more at peak than now, with the aspens all yellow and the tiny vine maples a brilliant red on the hillsides and along the fishing streams.

Early history of Jackson, reads much like that of Oregon. The region here was first visited by John Colter, a member of the Lewis and Clark expedition, who also discovered Yellowstone. The Astorians came this way in 1811 on their way to Oregon. Long before the white men settled, however, Jackson Hole was a favorite hunting ground for different tribes of Indians. It was named for David Jackson, a fur trapper. The first real settlers, however, came here later than in Oregon. It was in 1883 that the cattlemen moved in.

The formation of the Hole is made by the Grand Teton Range in the west, the Gros Ventre Mountains in the south, and the Wind River Mountains in the east. Snake River runs through the valley. The elk are protected and fed here in the winter — and 33 of the nation's 500 Trumpeter Swan population make their home here.

We enjoyed a brief stop at Palisades, where a government dam in process of construction reminded us of Detroit a few years ago. This is, however, the largest reclamation earth fill dam in the world. When completed it will be 260 feet high. We watched the huge dump trucks pile dirt upon dirt to form the dam which will furnish not only power but additional irrigation and help flood control. It is one of "McKay's dams," the natives here said as they told us how lucky we were to have "such a great man" live in our home town. No divided opinion, such as we found in Eastern Oregon, was evident in this part of Idaho where residents told us they "just wished McKay could represent us" in Washington, D. C.

Political Opinion Divided

In Eastern Oregon, we found political opinion quite "split" — not over Republican and Democrat issues, but over McKay and Morse. Those who were not favoring our former secretary of the interior, were not so much "Morse men," as plainly opposing McKay. Not that we didn't find numerous McKay supporters, too, but it was amazing to find so many opposers in former Republican stronghold.

"It isn't a matter of political partisanship. It's a dam question," we were solemnly told.

And we might be trite and add that the world's a small place: Our first stop in Jackson was at a service station. The first person that we met there was Leo Kenney, formerly of Salem, and his first remark after learning we were from Salem was "tell Alden Eddie hello when you return."
