Graham Asks Churches Aid Race Dispute

NEW YORK, Sept. 27—Evangelist Billy Graham says most of the South's Negro and white ministers agree that "race relations are worse now than they were two years ago."

And, said Graham, most of the clergymen "confessed that the church is doing far too little about it."

Writing in the current issue of Life magazine, Graham said he came to that conclusion after discussing the problem of integration of the races with Southern ministers of all denominations.

The evangelist said he also believed that the vast majority of Southern clergymen do not hold extremist views on the explosive integration issue.

"Most of them feel," he wrote, "that segregation should be ended not on buses, in railroad and bus stations, hotels and in restaurants."

"However, most of them feel it is far too early to implement school integration in some sections of the Deep South."

"They seem to feel that the day will come when both races will be psychologically and spiritually ready for it, but that the time has not come yet."

While many "misconceptions" about integration exist, Graham said, there are many real "difficulties" to be solved.

"There is the fear of intermarriage and the mongrelization of the race," he wrote. "These problems, I admit, are not easy. They definitely exist. With many of these difficulties the sociologist, anthropologist, scientist and legislator can help."

Graham said he himself had decided "after study of the Bible, as well as current events," that all of his future "crusades" would be conducted on an "equal basis."

He pledged to "hold no more crusades unless all of any race can sit where they please."
