Did you know? ... It's not easy to say no to a customer—especially one whom you've served many years and with whom you have built a good relationship. But, as usually is the case, a distasteful pill often does the most good for the patient.

When this particular customer came in a few weeks back she wanted a certain kind of shoe—a comfortable, casual wedge for around the house that also would be dressy enough to wear "over town" occasionally. That's a pretty tough prescription, but I did my best to come up with the answer.

Finally, after she had considered some seven or eight different styles, I said: "Could it be that we're trying to do the impossible? After all, you won't wear your housedress when you go over town, you'll change to something more appropriate. Isn't the same true for your shoes?"

"Maybe," she replied, "but I don't want two pair of shoes." She slipped her old shoes back on. "I want one pair that will do both things." When she left, I knew she was peeved with me. But two days later she was back, friendly as ever. "Remember those grey wedgies you showed me the other day? I'd like to try them on." After I'd got them off the shelf and she'd walked around in them a bit, she said: "Now let me see those black pumps you showed me."

At the counter while I was wrapping both pairs of shoes, my friend smiled a bit sheepishly. "I guess you were right about the right shoe for the right occasion."

I figure she must have talked it over with her husband who has told me his personal theory for financial success many times: "You can't buy both security and profit speculation with the same dollar. If you want both, you have to invest two dollars—one for security and one for speculation."
